Of course, the gold dollar of America has gone back now from a value of sixty-odd cents, as a year and a half ago it was in Madrid or Barcelona, until to-day it is worth a dollar plus, as it ought to be. In fact, it will be worth more than a dollar in Spain under these existing conditions within a very short time. In the meantime the American dollar has risen, as relates to the British pound sterling, until it is worth $1.12, we will say, and in France it is worth probably $1.33, and in Italy it is probably worth somewhere in the neighborhood of $1.70.

Senator FLETCHER. How much in Germany?

Senator OWEN. In Germany it is worth, of course, still more; in Roumania it is worth still more; in Russia it is worth still more, in terms of rubles, for reasons which are obvious to everyone.

But where nations are solvent, and where the conditions are fundamentally sound, it is obviously to the interest of the American people that the American dollar should be put to par and kept at par, so that the American dollar shall be the measure of value throughout the whole world in international transactions, and in that way expand the foreign commerce of the United States and give an increased market to the labor of the United States and to the raw materials which are supplied by the United States for world markets.

This can not be done if no man knows what the value of the dollar is. At present men in Italy can not buy at this price, except where the urgency is extremely great. American merchants who desire to sell their goods do not wish to sell them in terms of lira, because they do not know whether the lire they will get will be diminishing in value or increasing in value. American sellers desire to be paid in terms of dollars, whose value they know. But the Italians are not in a position to buy the American dollars at a fair rate, and they do not feel willing to enter into an agreement to pay in terms of dollars within the next 12 months, because they do not know but what the dollars within the next 12 months will become more difficult to buy and will rise in value, and therefore they will be pledging themselves not to pay interest but to pay something they can not forecast and which may result in ruin to them and to their business. And the committee must appraise these questions in order to comprehend the value of this bill introduced by Senator EDGE.

The sum and substance of it is that during the last month our exports fell off over a hundred millions of dollars. This month I have no doubt the loss in our exports will be very much larger. I am informed by a cable I saw yesterday that there had come to be almost an impasse in the buying of goods from Europe here in certain particular lines, because of the factors which I have just referred to. The value of the Edge bill is this, that it provides for the organization of corporations that shall have the right to transact international banking, and which may be organized, and in which the American national banks may participate to a limited extent, and therefore it affords a means by which a quick and large capital can be made available for the purpose of extending credit to Europe through the process of buying European bills, of making agreements by which European bills may be renewed three or four times per annum, and carried along until the people in Europe shall be able to repay the loans which are extended. The purpose of this Edge bill is to organize a means by which European credits can be marketed with the American investing public. It provides a mechanism to accomplish this, and, as far as it goes, it is a valuable factor helping the general question.

I think we are all pretty well agreed that the Government of the United States is hardly in a position where the taxing power can be properly used to extend further credits to European Governments, and this matter ought to be preferably left to those who are willing to extend credits of their own volition, and not to be compelled to extend credits through the taxing power. For this reason, I regard it as preferable to have a mechanism of this character established through which European credits can be marketed with the American investing public.

If this is not done, I warn this committee, as I have warned the Treasury Department time and time again, that we are going to meet with an obstruction to our foreign commerce that will react with the most injurious consequences upon the people of the United States, upon the home markets, and upon all sorts of stocks and securities. This committee will see it, and they will see it very soon, and the responsibility is on this committee to afford relief to American commerce.

I understand that this bill has been very carefully scrutinized by the Federal Reserve Board and the authorities of the Treasury Department, and that it meets with their substantial approval. I do not think the bill goes as far as it should go, but it is certainly an improvement on present conditions.

On February 20, 1918, I introduced a bill providing for the Federal reserve foreign bank, which would function in foreign banking much the same as the New York Federal Reserve Bank functions in domestic banking. I regretted very much to learn that some of the New York banks, with a great lack of vision, were under the impression that the establishment of a Federal reserve foreign bank would interfere with their profits in the handling of international exchange. It would interfere with those profits which are excessive. It would interfere with the profit which would be made by a bank in buying lire at 9 lire to the dollar, awaiting the time when it should react to 5.18 to the dollar. It would interfere with that, because it would help to stabilize international exchanges, and would bring profits on international exchanges down to a normal fixed level acceptable to all banks alike. The banks ought to be content with a reasonable profit, because the banks ought not to be willing to make profits on a basis which interferes with the commerce of the United States, and with the great productive industries of America, and with the great merchants of America engaged in importing and exporting. They ought to be willing to furnish reasonable accommodations at fair rates out of the deposits and capital which the people of the United States have placed with the banks in trust for management.

Therefore I urged a Federal reserve foreign bank which would tend to stabilize international exchange, and which would comprise another medium for placing the European credits advantageously with the Federal Reserve Banking System of the United States, and through the Federal reserve banks of the United States with member banks, and through the banks with the clients of member banks who were in a position to buy these securities advantageously. The whole point is that America has gone from the position of a debtor nation to a great creditor nation, and we will have to extend the credits now to the extent of our excess shipment of commodities. And by excess shipment of commodities I mean the excess of commodity exports over commodity imports. It has been running somewhere between three and four billion dollars the past year. If we keep that up, we will be compelled to extend credits to the extent of three or four billions; or just to the extent that these commodity shipments exceed the commodity imports. That is a perfectly plain and simple matter which anyone at all familiar with international exchange must thoroughly comprehend.

I introduced again yesterday this bill providing for a Federal reserve foreign bank, which I ask to be put in the record (see Exhibit B), and I remind the committee that the Federal Reserve Banking System provided for the Federal reserve foreign banking facilities in the first draft of the bill, and that was put in the draft of the bill upon the advice of the great New York banks; who at that time were interested in this matter. Indeed, if I remember correctly, such a provision was put in the original Monetary Commission bill that was presented to the Senate of the United States in 1912. Yet the Federal reserve domestic banks have found themselves so tremendously engaged in the development of internal banking business that they have not been able physically to work out the system of foreign banking which was contemplated by the original act.

I remind the committee that the activities of the New York Federal Reserve Bank have been so great that they have as many as 3,000 employees in that one bank. It would be naturally larger when the Government was putting over these big bond issues, because these Federal reserve banks have been great agencies in assisting the Government in placing these bonds.

The Federal reserve act was amended when the Federal reserve banks did not exercise the functions contemplated by the original act of giving foreign banking accommodations, so as to authorize the Federal Reserve Board to require these reserve banks to discharge this function. I rather take it that the Federal Reserve Board did not have the heart to require the best of all of these banks fitted to transact the business—that is, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York—to establish a foreign branch for the transaction of this foreign business, because the men who were in charge of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York are, after all, only flesh and blood, and there is a limit to which human beings can go in their activities.

I am very frankly of the opinion that we should extend the benefit of the Federal Reserve Banking System so as to include international banking in an orderly and organized way, without taxing to excess the banks we have already established, and I shall ask this committee to consider the question of this Federal reserve foreign bank, and I pray that it may not be considered in a partisan light, because the Federal Reserve System ought not to be regarded as a partisan matter. I should be very happy to yield any personal connection I have with it, if some other member would be good enough to present the matter in such a way as to accomplish the result. I care nothing about any credit with regard to it. But I do feel the most profound interest in the welfare of American commerce, and you gentlemen who are now in control of the Senate of the United States are charged with an obligation to protect and to advance and to promote the commerce of the United States. You are charged with the duty, and I urge you to exercise your proper functions and meet this responsibility, and to meet it at once. There is no time to be lost. I will gladly cooperate with you. I tell you that American commerce is being paralyzed right now. I know of men who have been anxious to export goods and who could not do so because the people to whom they would sell the goods could not buy the American dollars, although they could give credits that are absolutely sound and good. I will give you an instance, omitting the names, because I think it is not desirable to give names in such a connection.

An exporting firm in New York had an order for a million dollars' worth of goods from Roumania. The leading bank in Roumania was willing to put up in terms of leis—which corresponds with the franc—an amount equivalent to the order, payable in 12 months; was willing to put up $200,000 against the million-dollar order as an additional credit with a New York bank. This bank in Roumania has 800,000,000 leis deposits. It stands second in rank to the Government bank of Roumania. This bill would be underwritten by the exporting house. It would be underwritten by the merchant who was buying the goods. They desired to get the credit for one year, with three renewals every 90 days, paying a commission of one-quarter of 1 per cent for each renewal, making 1 per cent commission and 6 per cent for the loan. They were not able to get the accommodation, and the goods could not be shipped.

It is only one of many instances, but we have got to provide the mechanism, gentlemen, and this bill helps to accomplish that. I therefore favor it.

I will be glad to answer any question you would like to ask.

Senator GRONNA. As I remember the provisions of your bill, it was more of a Government bank you proposed, was it not?

Senator OWEN. Oh, yes; it was a Federal reserve foreign bank, connected with the Federal Reserve System, and a part of the system.

Senator GRONNA. Is it not also true that all during the war, at least during part of the time during the war, the foreign countries got the benefit, because the banks in the United States pegged the money and received foreign exchange at a much higher value than it actually was worth?

Senator OWEN. Great Britain pegged the exchange of pounds sterling by providing the money through loans from the United States to pay for all sterling bills, through Morgan & Co., at $4.76\frac{1}{2}$, which, of course, pegged the value of the pound sterling in its relative value to the American dollar, as far as British purchases were concerned, and limited the cost to Great Britain down to interest, and avoiding the loss of an adverse exchange. They were not subjected to the heavier cost that would have been reflected if they had been compelled to buy dollars at the rate of $4 for a pound sterling instead of $4.76.

Senator NEWBERRY. What would be the effect of the passage of both bills?

Senator OWEN. I think it would be very beneficial, indeed. It would help this matter immediately and would offer at once a mechanism through which these credits could be obtained. The bill to establish a Federal reserve foreign bank I introduced February 20, 1918, and reintroduced yesterday as S. 2582, and I also introduced a bill (S. 2590) to establish a foreign finance corporation to function or similar lines, as the British have organized various great corporations to protect their foreign trade.

Senator GRONNA. Who suffered that loss? Of course, somebody had to stand a loss.

Senator OWEN. The consumers of the commodities ultimately paid the difference in exchange. It amounted to this, that the purchases made by Great Britain were paid for at the rates fixed in the market here for goods, plus interest only, whatever interest the purchaser paid, plus the difference between $4.76\frac{1}{2}$ and $4.86, the gold value of the pound sterling, which made it an economical way in which Great Britain bought these goods. She only has to pay back these loans with interest and no more, excepting the slight difference between the pegged price $4.76 and the gold value of the pound, $4.86.

Senator GRONNA. I understand that.

Senator OWEN. Otherwise Great Britain or her merchants and people would have had to pay very much more for the commodities bought in the United States. Every loss in exchange is reflected in additional cost of commodities, so when sellers' exchange gets too high or buyers' exchange too low foreign purchasers must quit buying.

Senator GRONNA. When Spain would pay the United States the balance she might owe for exports, Spain would not buy American dollars; she would simply buy pounds sterling, would she not?

Senator OWEN. Spain must pay the United States in dollars, and she did buy pounds sterling and use them to buy dollars in the New York pegged market.

Senator GRONNA. And she would send the pounds sterling to New York, because New York had pegged them up to $4.76 and a fraction, and necessarily somebody had to stand a loss. If nobody else, the producers would have to stand the loss.

Senator OWEN. When our dollar appreciates the American producer begins to lose his market and must absorb a part of the loss by lowering his price of necessity. The consumer stood part of the loss of buying from Spain when Spanish pesetas appreciated, but the reduction of the value of the American dollar in Spain was due to our extending credits to Great Britain, and Great Britain using the American dollars which she got from us to pay her own debts with Spain. The consequence was that the American dollar went down in Spain. That is what happened. That cost the American consumer, of course, who bought Spanish products, just to the extent that the American dollar went down in its purchasing power in Spain.

Now that Spain and the United States are dealing separately from Great Britain, and Spain has withdrawn her gold balances in the United States ($25,000,000), the peseta has gone to 19 cents, and our dollar is above par.

Senator GRONNA. What concerns me is this: Suppose that a foreign bank is established, and this bank would make an effort to regulate this exchange. The bank will not stand that loss.

Senator OWEN. Oh, no; the bank will be merely a medium, that is all.

Senator GRONNA. Is there anyone, except either the consumer or the producer, who necessarily must stand the loss?

Senator OWEN. It will not be any loss, Senator. If the American investing public will buy these European securities upon a safe basis, then the securities will be extended, and that will bring these exchanges back to normal, and we will not have a loss to either consumer or producer; otherwise we will have a loss to both.

Senator GRONNA. That is a matter of credit.

Senator OWEN. Certainly it is.

Senator GRONNA. That is a matter of credit, and it is a matter of either an inflated value or the true value. We all know that if these countries were not burdened with the heavy debt that they are burdened with to-day, this question would not arise, Senator OWEN. It is a good deal the same as if I were worth a hundred thousand dollars and I extended my credit to a million dollars, and if you were dealing with me, naturally you would look into my financial condition, and you would question whether or not you would invest in my goods, in my securities, as a safe proposition. If you did invest, you would simply want a large discount. Is not that true?

Senator OWEN. Europe can give us security as good as gold, better than gold, because we need no more gold, and gold bears no interest in our own vaults, expands our currency, while good securities bring in interest every day as an earning. Senator, if you will pardon me a moment, and will give me the honor of your attention——

Senator GRONNA. I will. I want your interpretation of it.

Senator OWEN. It is not proposed to have these banks deal with securities that are not secure. It is not proposed that they shall take securities that are not sound. It is not proposed that they shall sell to the American investing public securities that are not absolutely stable. While it is true that Europe has been wounded, I think we have greatly misunderstood the productive capacity of Europe, and we have misunderstood, in large measure, the cost of this war. France, for instance, is holding almost entirely the bonded issue which France put out. The French people own those bonds, and the French people, therefore, who are the owners of the bonds, have on their books broadly a national debit and a personal credit balancing each other. There was not a destruction of French property except in the narrow margin on the northern part of France where the villages were destroyed, and in some cities where important manufacturing plants were destroyed. The body of France is not destroyed; the productive power of France is not destroyed. The French women have been taught to labor as never before. There have been brought into the field of labor as never before millions of human beings. The stimulation of invention and the development of machinery in France have grown in an enormous way. The productive power of France has probably increased not less than 50 per cent, and the indebtedness of this war, which has passed from one set of people into the hands of another set of people, is neither an asset nor a liability. When you put them against each other they cancel each other. The French are able to pay their debts—they will pay their debts, and they will pay them dollar for dollar. There is no question in the world about the solvency of the French or of the British or of the Italians or of the Belgian people.

Senator FLETCHER. Is it not true, in further answer to Senator GRONNA'S suggestion, that the main purpose here is to afford machinery whereby the securities that are now tied up can be released?

Senator OWEN. Yes. We have not an adequate mechanism. Senator GRONNA is entirely right in what he said about this matter. There is no difference between himself and myself at all. The only thing is that we are looking at it from a different angle.

Senator CALDER. In the act of March 4, 1919, authorizing the issue of bonds, the Victory loan, there was a provision permitting the War Finance Corporation to extend a credit of $1,000,000,000 to American exporters. Do you recall that?

Senator OWEN. Yes.

Senator CALDER. Do you know if anything was ever done under that?

Senator OWEN. They have practically done nothing, and it is a pity. They have done nothing. That money has not been used, and is not going to be used.

Senator CALDER. Has any of it been used?

Senator OWEN. A little of it, but practically none at all. They have been confused. Mr. Eugene Meyers, Director War Finance Corporation, went over to Europe recently to find out what to do, and how to do, but he has no definite plan to submit. If he had any plan to submit, he would assuredly act on it. If he has any legislative plan to submit he would come to the committee. Nothing is being done, and I tell you that something has to be done. You can not sit here and allow the foreign commerce of this country to go on the rocks.

I should like also to have printed as a part of the record a bill introduced by me yesterday providing for a foreign finance corporation (Exhibit C).

Mr. Chairman, I have not talked to any of you gentlemen in regard to this. I would be glad to know what the attitude of the committee is in regard to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not taken any action on it. We are trying to get action. Senator EDGE was here, and he made a brief statement this morning, but we had no stenographer, and I wish Senator EDGE would repeat his statement, if he is willing to do so—if you have finished, Senator OWEN.

Senator OWEN. I have. I did not know that Senator EDGE was here, or I would not have taken the floor. I am very deeply interested in this matter, and regard it as a matter of supreme national importance.

PROPOSED CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as I was about to say a moment ago, I have no disposition to interfere with the consideration or the passage of the bill to repeal the daylight-saving law, and I have no disposition to interfere with the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from New Jersey, although I think there ought to be some very serious consideration given to it prior to its passage; but I rise for the purpose of making a request for unanimous consent, to which I think both Senators and all other Senators will agree. Our calendar is crowded with bills; the House is going in a few days to take a recess and cease to do any public business for six weeks or so, and I should like to ask unanimous consent to-morrow at some time to sound the calendar for the consideration of unobjected bills. There are a number of little bills that will pass readily here and not be objected to in the other House, and which ought to go to the other House before it takes its recess. I therefore submit a request for unanimous consent that during the morning hour to-morrow the calendar may be sounded for the consideration and passage of unobjected bills.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the first place, I wish to say to the Senator that I think the calendar, under Rule VIII, ought to be taken up, but I think the proper request to make would be to proceed now to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII. I do not think that we have a right to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement to take up the calendar at a certain hour to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Probably the Senator is right about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there will be any objection to the request if the Senator will make it to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose I ask unanimous consent to take up the calendar now, and then postpone proceeding with it until to-morrow morning?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi will wait just a moment, until, if possible, I get the bill repealing the daylight-saving law before the Senate, I shall ask that it be temporarily laid aside, so that it will not interfere with the request of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, with the understanding that the Senator will get his bill before the Senate, and then will ask, if I do not happen to be present, that it be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to sound the calendar for unobjected bills, I have no objection.

REPEAL OF DAYLIGHT-SAVING LAW.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3854) for the repeal of the daylight-saving law.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, will the Senator excuse me just for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to lay the bill aside instantly after it is taken up, so that the Senator from Oklahoma will not be interfered with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3854.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3854) for the repeal of the daylight-saving law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent now that the Senate proceed to sound the calendar for the consideration of unobjected bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I fully appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Iowa in speaking as he did of his desire to press his measure but, at the same time, without interfering with those who have given notice of their intention to address the Senate upon some other subject. I have no objection whatsoever to the request of the Senator from Mississippi that the calendar shall be sounded, nor have I any desire that I should in attempting to address the Senate take up any time which the Senator from Iowa might use. I can see very well that there might be a conflict in the event of the calendar being taken up, all the morning hour consumed, and the unfinished business then laid before the Senate. I will, however, yield to the Senator from Iowa to-morrow in the event that condition should arise.

Mr. FLETCHER. The request of the Senator from Mississippi is that the calendar be considered now.

Mr. FALL. I understood that the request was that it be considered to-morrow morning.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the Senator from Mississippi requested that the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar be proceeded with now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Mississippi is that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The first business on the calendar was the resolution (S. Res. 76) defining a peace treaty which shall assure to the people of the United States the attainment of the ends for which they entered the war, and declaring the policy of our Government to meet fully obligations to ourselves and to the world.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

ADAM AND NOAH BROWN.

The bill (S. 529) for the relief of the heirs of Adam and Noah Brown was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may we have the report on this bill read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report. After having read for some time,

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I observe that this is a very lengthy report. I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the Senate. I do not know that I have any objection to the bill, but I should like to go into it carefully. I therefore ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 600) for the relief of the heirs of Mrs. Susan A. Nicholas was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1289) for the relief of Simon M. Preston was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1479) for the relief of the estate of Moses M. Bane was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

UNITED STATES LEGATION AT BANGKOK, SIAM.

The bill (S. 2250) providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States in Bangkok, Siam, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of State, acting as the agent of the Government of the United States, to transfer to the Government of Siam all title to, and interest in, that parcel of land, located in the city of Bangkok, Siam, on the river Menam Chao Phya, together with the buildings and other appurtenances appertaining thereto, which His Majesty the King of Siam, in 1884, presented to the Government of the United States for legation purposes; and to receive in exchange therefor from the Government of Siam title to all that parcel of land and the buildings and other appurtenances appertaining thereto, situated on the Klong Poh Yome, in the city of Bangkok, Siam, which the Government of the United States now rents and occupies for legation purposes, together with a certain parcel of land contiguous thereto, the said transfer not to be made until satisfactory title to the property to be acquired by the Government of the United States has been made by the Government of Siam.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to have some explanation from some member of the committee in regard to this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, my recollection of the matter is that a number of years ago Siam presented to the United States a site for a legation, and we have been occupying it for some time. Later, however, a change in the development of the town of Bangkok resulted in making this a neighborhood undesirable for legations and representatives of foreign nations, and they have been gradually moving away. Now the same nation offers to give us another site and to accept the old one in exchange. It is recommended by the Department of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1004) for the relief of the owner of the steam lighter Cornelia was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1005) for the relief of the owner of the steamship Matoa was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1006) for the relief of the schooner Horatio G. Foss was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1222) for the relief of the schooner Henry O. Barrett was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1223) for the relief of the owner of the steamer Mayflower and for the relief of passengers on board said steamer was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

KATE CANNIFF.

The bill (S. 219) for the relief of Kate Canniff was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Kate Canniff the sum of $1,345, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the death of her husband, James Canniff, who received injuries April 15, 1901, while in the service of the United States on the lighthouse tender Haze, and as a result of which he died on October 20, 1909.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is there any report with respect to this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks for the reading of the report.

Mr. KING. If it is brief. If it is long, I will not ask it. Can any Senator make any explanation as to the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is one of the regular claims made in the case of a widow whose husband was killed in the service of the United States. The bill, as introduced, carried an appropriation of $5,000; but it has been reduced to the regular rates paid in such cases, namely, for one year's service.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator know why it was not presented for consideration long before this?

Mr. SMOOT. That I can not say; but I have no doubt the claim should be paid, in accordance with the practice of the Senate.

Mr. KING. With that assurance, I shall not ask for the reading of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ARMY OFFICERS.

The bill (S. 257) for the relief of certain officers in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I dislike to offer any objection; but can any Senator make any explanation as to the necessity of this measure—its justice and merits?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I will say that I am quite sure these are items that were passed on the Army bill, but were rejected by the House. The Military Affairs Committee subsequently put them into a bill by themselves, and they are now presented for passage by the Senate. Every item in this bill has been already passed upon by the Senate and by the Military Affairs Committee twice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that this bill also passed the Senate at the last session, too late, however, to receive consideration by the House of Representatives; and it embraces only such bills as have been audited and are regularly found due.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry? Was the objection of the House based upon the fact that it was legislation upon an appropriation bill or some intrinsic objection that was urged?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The objection was that it was legislation upon a general appropriation bill.

Mr. KING. I have no objection, then.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that every year there is a bill of this character, and the Secretary of War reports to Congress the amount of these claims, which are generally small in amount and, I was going to say, large in number. This is simply carrying out the practice that has been followed for years.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow credits in the accounts of the persons herein stated.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the amounts enumerated herein out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely:

BUFFALO RIVER ZINC MINING CO.

The bill (S. 728) for the relief of the Buffalo River Zinc Mining Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have the bill read.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

ARUNDEL SAND & GRAVEL CO.

The bill (S. 1670) for the relief of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. WOLCOTT June 26, 1919, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1670) for the relief of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co., having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

The facts in the case are fully set forth in Senate Report No. 716, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session, which is appended hereto and made a part of this report. In referring to said Senate Report No. 716, the amendments therein suggested should be now disregarded for the reason that the end sought to be reached by said amendments is provided for in the pending bill by phraseology differing from the phraseology of the bill as introduced in the Sixty-fifth Congress. Said amendments are, therefore, inappropriate in considering the pending bill.

[Senate Report No. 716, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session.]

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4526) for the relief of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co., having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass with the following amendments:

"On page 2, line 2, after the word 'any,' insert the word 'as.'

"On page 2, line 2, after the word 'against,' insert the words 'or in favor of.'

"On page 2, line 3, after the word 'of,' insert the words 'or against.'

"This bill provides that the claim of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware and doing business in the city of Norfolk, Va., owner of the steam tug A. G. Bigelow, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the said tug and the U. S. S. Susquehanna in Norfolk harbor on the 26th day of November, 1917, may be sued for by the said Arundel Sand & Gravel Co. in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against or in favor of the United States, in favor of or against the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co., upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal.

"Your committee is of the opinion that the claimant is entitled under every equitable consideration to have its claims adjudicated in a United States court in an admiralty proceeding, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill as amended."

Mr. SMOOT. I was wondering whether any Senator present has any information as to why there is not some kind of a report from the department as to this particular claim. Such claims are generally referred to the department for a report, and we have a report giving the facts in the case. I see none in this report.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator that the bill merely authorizes the company to sue.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no action required on the part of the department.

Mr. SMOOT. But it is very unusual. In fact, I do not remember that a bill has ever been passed in this form. If we are going to allow such matters to be settled in this way, with no investigation at all by the department, then we are opening the door, and I do not know where it is going to lead to. I think the bill ought to go over.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think the best possible investigation of a claim of this sort is by trial in a court of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. SMOOT. There may be something in that, but that has not usually been the case. I will say to the Senator that such cases have been adjudicated in another way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask that the bill may go over?

Mr. SMOOT. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CATHERINE GRACE.

The bill (S. 1375) for the relief of Catherine Grace was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the sum of $469.50, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Catherine Grace, widow of James Grace, who died as a result of injuries received by him, the said James Grace, while in the performance of his duties as an employee of the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF W. H. SNEED, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 767) for the relief of the heirs of W. H. Sneed, deceased, was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from Utah object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I asked that the bill go over. I see that it is for a claim for rent for $1,366.66, "being for the use or rent of a building in Knoxville, Tenn., during the War of the Rebellion, and for which vouchers were given in lieu of payment by the United States quartermasters."

There is an omnibus bill every year or so covering such items. We thought, when the last omnibus bill passed, it took in everything that was known in the United States. Not only that, Mr. President, there has been a rule adopted as to claims based on things such as this building was used for, and as to what damage was done to the building, and so on. I see nothing in the report which shows anything that would lead the committee to report the bill, as it seems to me, under the rules that have been adhered to in the past.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection. This bill is for compensation for the occupancy of a hotel in Knoxville during the period of the war. A similar bill has been twice passed by the Senate, but passed too late for consideration by the House. It was very carefully considered in committee, is a case undoubtedly of merit, and I hope the Senator will not press his objection. I am anxious to get it to the House in time for its consideration at this session, particularly as I think possibly it was my fault that it did not go over in time at the last session and the Congress before.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I do not think the House will consider it by day after to-morrow. But that is neither here nor there. Does the Senator know why this claim was not put in the last omnibus claims bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I do. There were some private matters in the family, to be perfectly frank with the Senator, there were some quarrels among the people, there was a contest over the administrator or executor, and the chief beneficiary had her attention called to her rights in the premises in the last two or three years.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withdraw the objection, because I think they will have more time in the House to go into its consideration, but I feel quite sure it is a violation of the rule followed by the Committee on Claims in the past.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN TENNESSEE.

The bill (S. 662) to amend section 107 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as heretofore amended, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 107 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as heretofore amended, be, and it is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 107. The State of Tennessee is divided into three districts, to be known as the eastern, middle, and western districts of Tennessee. The eastern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Bledsoe, Bradley, Hamilton, James, McMinn, Meigs, Polk, Rhea, and Sequatchie, which shall constitute the southern division of said district; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Anderson, Blount, Campbell, Claiborne, Grainger, Jefferson, Knox, Loudon, Monroe, Morgan, Roane, Sevier, Scott, and Union, which shall constitute the northern division of said district; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Carter, Cocke, Greene, Hamblen, Hancock, Hawkins, Johnson, Sullivan, Unicoi, and Washington, which shall constitute the northeastern division of said district. Terms of the district court for the southern division of said district shall be held at Chattanooga on the fourth Monday in April and the second Monday in November; for the northern division at Knoxville on the fourth Monday in May and the first Monday in December; and for the northeastern division at Greeneville on the first Monday in March and the third Monday in September. The middle district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Bedford, Cannon, Cheatham, Davidson, Dickson, Giles, Hickman, Humphreys, Houston, Lawrence, Lewis, Marshall, Maury, Montgomery, Robertson, Rutherford, Stewart, Sumner, Trousdale, Wayne, Williamson, and Wilson, which shall constitute the Nashville division of said district; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Franklin, Warren, Grundy, Marion, Coffee, Moore, and Lincoln, which shall constitute the Winchester division of said district; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Clay, Cumberland, Dekalb, Fentress, Jackson, Macon, Overton, Pickett, Putnam, Smith, Van Buren, and White, which shall constitute the northeastern division of said district. Terms of the district court for the Nashville division of said district shall be held at Nashville on the second Monday in March and the fourth Monday in September; for the Winchester division at Winchester, on the first Monday in April and the third Monday in November; and for the northeastern division at Cookeville on the third Monday in April and the first Monday in November: Provided, That suitable accommodations for holding the courts at Winchester and Cookeville shall be provided by the local authorities without expense to the United States. The western district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Dyer, Fayette, Haywood, Lauderdale, Shelby, and Tipton, shall constitute the western division of said district; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Benton, Carroll, Chester, Crockett, Decatur, Gibson, Hardeman, Hardin, Henderson, Henry, Lake, McNairy, Madison, Obion, Perry, and Weakley, including the waters of the Tennessee River to low-water mark on the eastern shore thereof wherever such river forms the boundary line between the western and middle districts of Tennessee, from the north line of the State of Alabama, north to the point Henry County, Tenn., where the south boundary line of the State of Kentucky strikes the east bank of the river, which shall constitute the eastern division of said district. Terms of the district court for the western division of said district shall be held at Memphis on the fourth Mondays in May and November; and for the eastern division at Jackson on the fourth Mondays in April and October. The clerk of the court for the western district shall appoint a deputy who shall reside at Jackson. The marshal for the western district shall appoint a deputy who shall reside at Jackson. The marshal for the eastern district shall appoint a deputy who shall reside at Chattanooga. The clerk of the court for the eastern district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Knoxville, at Chattanooga, and at Greeneville, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMMA H. RIDLEY.

The next bill on the calendar was the bill (S. 174) for the relief of Emma H. Ridley.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], who introduced the bill, vouchsafe an explanation of it?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the bill appropriates $3,000 for the widow of Dr. George A. Ridley, who had charge of the hospital at Ancon, in the Canal Zone. While there, during an epidemic of pneumonia, because of his strict attention to his duties, he caught the disease and died. There are reports here from the department. There is one from former Secretary Stimson, urging that the appropriation be made. It is in line with what we have done in like cases before. This man gave up his life while performing his duty to others. The bill makes an appropriation of one year's pay for his widow.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry for my information?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is it the contention of the Senator that the family of every person in the employ of the Government who dies, regardless of the character of his service, receives a certain compensation?

Mr. CALDER. No; it is not. This man, under extraordinary circumstances, had charge of an important hospital, where he ran unusual risks, and I think, under the circumstances of the case, the bill ought to receive favorable consideration by the Senate. A similar bill was reported favorably last year, and it has frequently been reported favorably in the House. I think it is a very meritorious measure. In like cases, I may say to the Senator from Utah, we have appropriated money.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator whether there is any rule by which you determine the amount which is to be paid. I noticed a case a moment ago where the amount allowed was $1,000. Here it is $3,000.

Mr. CALDER. It is one year's salary.

Mr. SMOOT. Is not the Senator mistaken in saying that there have been appropriations in similar cases? I know we have appropriated money where a doctor has submitted himself to tests in fever-stricken districts. We have always taken care of the widow in a case of that kind. I understand this doctor was simply serving in the capacity of a physician and took the disease and died from it.

Mr. CALDER. There was an epidemic of pneumonia in the hospital at Ancon at the time, and he became infected with that disease.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator understand that there were any other employees there who died from the disease whose heirs might bring a claim against the Government?

Mr. CALDER. I do not know that there are any other cases.

Mr. SMOOT. The rule applies where they have been killed in the service, but I can remember no other case of this kind. I was wondering whether we are not opening a new field.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think that, technically speaking, this probably would not come under the rule, because we have given a year's salary where the employee in the line of his service was injured or killed. But this case could not be put in the other class, either. This doctor, as I understand it, was following out his business, in which he was taking care of the patients and overlooking various others under him in this hospital. It was in the nature of being employed in the line of duty. While he was doing that he became infected with the disease that he was trying to save other people from. So it is somewhat similar to a case where a man was killed in the line of his employment. I can see a similarity in this case that would not exist in the ordinary case.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize what the Senator says is true, and yet there is that difference, and it is for the Senate to decide whether they want to make that violation, if I may so term it, of the rule that has been established in the past. I agree with what the Senator from Nebraska has said as to the case, but it is not altogether similar to one where the man was through some accident killed. I recognize that difference.

Mr. CALDER. Some nurses and doctors make great sacrifices in their enthusiasm in their work, and it seems to me we can well go that far, and that they are entitled to as much consideration as though they were killed in actual employment in the service of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from New York what difference there is between the case now under consideration and the case of a physician here who is serving in St. Elizabeths or some other hospital in which the Government has some interest?

Mr. NORRIS. The hospital at Ancon is a Government hospital, I understand. In real merit, I would say to the Senator, I do not believe there is any difference. If I could, I would be glad to do something in every case where, for the sake of humanity, doctors and nurses often lose their lives. I would like to help their dependents. But in this particular case the service was really in behalf of the Government. It was a Government hospital. I think Dr. Ridley was a little different from an ordinary doctor in an ordinary private hospital.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit a question? What difference is there in principle between a man who accepts employment to work as a doctor in a hospital or for the Government at a compensation which he deems sufficiently great to induce him to leave his private practice and devote himself to Government work, and some individual who is working in one of the departments here, and who, while in the discharge of his or her duty, is taken down with the influenza and death ensues?

Mr. NORRIS. I think there would be considerable difference. If such an employee as the Senator speaks of were in the hospital, I would not care whether he was a doctor or not, if in that particular work, while he was there performing his duty, he caught a disease from which he died. There may be some other circumstances in regard to this particular case. The doctor may have overworked himself, as they often do, I know, in such cases. If it was an ordinary laborer there who lost his life, I would think just the same about it.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recognize that during the epidemic of influenza which we had last year a large number of employees in various activities of the Government, while in the discharge of their duties, were afflicted with the disease and it culminated in their death. There may be some difference in principle, but I do not see it, between a case of this kind and the case of some person who accepts employment as a physician for three or four or five thousand dollars a year, or whatever salary he accepted, and who, while in the performance of his duties, takes some disease and dies.

Mr. NORRIS. I think in the case the Senator mentions there is a difference. It seems to me there is plainly a difference. If an employee, for instance, of the Senate or any of the departments of the Government should be taken sick with one of these diseases, the "flu," let us say, it would be vastly different from one whose employment took him into a sick room where he was taking care and had charge of sick people. His duty led him where he contracted the disease. It is true he might have died from some other cause if he had not gone there, but that is a little different from the ordinary employee who, like anyone else, contracts one of these diseases.

Mr. KING. I confess I am unable to appreciate any distinction between the case now presented, as I understand the facts, and the case where any employee of the Government while in the discharge of his duty was afflicted with some ailment which culminated in his death. Here is a doctor accepting employment from the Government presumably because he can get a larger compensation while working for the Government than if he continued in his private practice. If he elects to go to Panama to work in a hospital for the Government rather than to continue his private practice here, and while in Panama meets with some accident or some disease afflicts him and death ensues, I see no valid reason why his heirs should be paid and the heirs of some person dying here who was employed in a Government department are denied compensation. I can not see any distinction. There may be, but my mind is not acute enough to see any valid distinction between those two cases.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think this is an unusual case. This doctor was the assistant in charge of the hospital. The principal medical officer in charge was away. This epidemic came and he was required to give service night and day. Because of the unusual circumstances, because of his attention to his duty during the epidemic, he caught the disease and died. If he had had proper assistants, if the head of the hospital had been there to help in the work, it is very likely he would not have forfeited his life.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. KING. There are a very large number of hospitals in the United States under the supervision of, if not directly owned by, the Government of the United States. There are some civilian employees there. There are some doctors who have elected to give up their private practice and go into the Government service and accept employment there. They are doing splendid work; they are competent and are discharging their duties with fidelity. Suppose one of them should contract a malady that would culminate in his death.

Mr. CALDER. As a result of his service in the hospital.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think the Government should pay in that case?

Mr. CALDER. I think the Government in that case should pay his widow the equivalent of a year's salary. I would gladly vote for it in every such case.

Mr. KING. Then if that is true, why should not the Government pay for everybody who is in its employ——

Mr. CALDER. Oh, no.

Mr. KING. And who while in the discharge of his duty received some injury or is afflicted with some ailment which results in his death?

Mr. CALDER. Oh, no. This particular profession, the medical profession, is an unusually hazardous one, and the widow of the man who gives his service in a Government institution and incurs some disease from which he loses his life is entitled to a year's compensation.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, is there any greater hazard than in the life-guard service, the men serving the lifeboats or serving upon the sea? I am not objecting to the payment. It may be that the Government ought to provide some system of compensation for the heirs of those who meet their death while in the Government service. I have not given sufficient attention to the matter to have a well-formed opinion, but the point I am attempting to make is that this seems to me to be a discrimination. When a physician accepts employment at a far higher rate of compensation than is received by a laborer who is working for the Government meets his death as the laboring man meets his death, both acting in the discharge of their duties and serving their country, I can not see why the family of the physician should be paid and the family of the laborer should not be paid, for the reason assigned by the Senator, namely, that the hazards of the physician's service are greater than the hazards of the other man's service.

It may be that some of the services in which individuals may be employed in manual labor are far more hazardous than the services of the physician and expose the individual to greater hazard of accident and death than the physician is exposed to. I do not think the distinction exists which warrants the payment in the case of the physician and the refusal to pay in the case of the laborer.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that the family of the laborer who loses his life while occupied in his official duty is paid to-day a year's salary, and I can see no reason why the family of this doctor, whose life was lost in the same way, should not receive the same treatment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over under the objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator allow me to call up a bill to which there will be no objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the Senator from Kansas proposes to resume the consideration of the Calendar to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. We will try to get up the Calendar to-morrow. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 1, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 31, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Impart unto us, our Father in heaven, plenteously of Thy substance, that in all the transactions with our fellow men we may act wisely, conscientiously, justly, and thus rise to the highest conceptions of the moral and religious ideals inculcated by the Prince of Men in His life and precepts. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may have leave to sit during the recess of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have leave to sit during the recess of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reference of H. R. 416, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, may be changed to the Committee on the Public Lands. The Committee on the Public Lands took up the bill and voted that it belonged to that committee.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman consulted the chairman of the committee?

Mr. RAKER. I have consulted the chairmen of both committees.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have leave to sit during the recess of the House, by subcommittee or full committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have leave to sit during the recess of the House, by subcommittee or full committee. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, what was the request that the gentleman has made?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For the Committee on Rules to sit during the recess of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What on earth can they do during vacation?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A great many resolutions are pending before the committee upon which Members and others are desirous of submitting evidence. We think we can save a great deal of time by having meetings during the vacation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. For the present, I object.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That OSCAR E. KELLER, a Member elect from the State of Minnesota, be, and is hereby, elected a member of the standing committees of the House, as follows: Claims; Coinage, Weights, and Measures; Railways and Canals.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KITCHIN moves the election of GEORGE B. GRIGSBY, Delegate from the Territory of Alaska, to membership of the Committee on the Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 214.

Resolved, That there shall be printed for the use of the House 5,000 copies of "The War with Germany, a Statistical Summary," by Col. Leonard P. Ayres, United States Army, to be distributed to Members through the folding room.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is this matter you are asking to print.

Mr. KIESS. It is called "The War with Germany, a Statistical Summary," by Col. Leonard P. Ayres, United States Army. Most of the Members, I think all, have received a copy from the Secretary of War. It is a very valuable document, and we are providing for the printing of 5,000 copies—paper back, of course.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many will that give each Member?

Mr. KIESS. Ten.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the gentleman read it himself?

Mr. KIESS. Well, I have not read it all; I did not get it until the other day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the gentleman read enough to see whether it is any good?

Mr. KIESS. Oh, absolutely; I have read enough to know that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 1378. An act to authorize the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey to construct a bridge across the navigable waters of the Newark Bay, in the State of New Jersey;

S. 1361. An act further extending the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by an act entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges or viaducts across the waters between the mainland at or near Cedar Point and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Island," approved June 18, 1912, as extended by an act approved June 30, 1916; and

S. 180. An act to incorporate Near East Relief.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON A BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

House resolution 168.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed to appoint a special committee for the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be known as the Select Committee on the Budget, to which shall be referred for consideration and report all bills, resolutions, and documents for the establishment of a national budget system or proposing changes in present methods of dealing with appropriations, estimates, and expenditures.

The committee shall consist of 12 Members, of whom 7 shall be appointed from the majority party and 5 from the minority party.

The committee or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions or recesses of the House, and may have done such printing and binding as may be necessary in connection with the performance of its duties.

The committees of the House of the Sixty-sixth Congress to which have been referred bills and resolutions dealing with the jurisdiction herein authorized shall be relieved from the consideration of such bills and resolutions and the same shall thereupon be referred to the special committee herein provided for.

The committee may report by bill or otherwise to the House of Representatives with any recommendations it shall choose to make and shall have the right to report at any time.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 3, page 2, striking out the word "relieved" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "discharged."

In line 4, page 2, after the first "the" inserting the word "further."

In line 7, page 2, striking out the word "may" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "shall."

In lines 9 and 10, page 2, after the word "make," striking out the remainder of the paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof "not later than March 1, 1920."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules. The committee heard among others the Speaker of the House; former Speaker CLARK, the author of the resolution; Mr. GOOD of Iowa; Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee; Mr. MONDELL, the majority leader, and they all reviewed the discussions heretofore had upon the subject of a budget system. It is a subject the House of Representatives has approached on many occasions but on which it has never taken definite action. This resolution is brought out for the purpose of enabling the House to take definite action on this very important subject.

The reasons for the budget system have been urged by economists and statesmen for many years. At this time the business men of the country, organized as they are in the chambers of commerce, have made a very thorough study of the budget system and have made an investigation of the sentiments and experience of the country with respect to the budget system in the States. Their report is to the effect that the business men of the country are almost unanimous in the opinion that a budget system should be established, with a view of a more economical and fair assessment of taxes and payment of moneys out of the Treasury of the United States. It is for the purpose of realizing the hopes of the people in respect to this matter that this resolution is brought before the House at this time.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has just suggested an amendment that I think might properly be adopted. He suggests that, in line 3, on page 2, we strike out the words "shall be" and insert "are hereby," so that it will read "are hereby discharged."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I think the suggested amendment is a good one, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as pending with the other amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as pending with the other amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a resolution of very great importance. It is, as stated, reported unanimously from the Committee on Rules. It had the approval before that committee of the Speaker of the House, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the former Speaker of the House, the present minority leader, and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations and the leader of the majority on the floor. More and more the sentiment is growing throughout the country that there should be some change in our methods of appropriating the Federal revenues. Of course, there are very wide differences of opinion as to what changes should be made. Efforts have been made, somewhat sporadic, it is true, in the past during my time of service here to bring about the changes, at least so far as the House is concerned. The party of which I am a member attempted, through caucus committees, to work out some sort of a system whereby the rules might be changed, but we failed in our efforts. So far as I now recall, during my service here the only tangible proposition that ever reached the House of Representatives and was passed on by the House of Representatives was that which was contained in the deficiency appropriation bill passed at the last session of Congress, but which failed of final passage. The principle was indorsed in our party's national platform.

The methods that have been suggested are various. As has been explained by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], numerous propositions are now pending, some of them legislative, some of them merely affecting the rules of the House, if I remember correctly; but divergent opinions are represented, and it has seemed to the Committee on Rules that if we are to obtain any tangible results at all, it is a very proper thing, indeed, to centralize the study of this very great and important question in one committee, and not divide it up among different committees of varying jurisdiction. I very much hope that successful results may be obtained from the appointment of this committee. At any rate I feel assured that this is the intelligent way in which to approach and deal with this very great, very important question, in which there now exists so much interest in the country on the part of the students of economics, on the part of business men, and on the part of the taxpayers of the country. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this resolution. Certainly some reform somewhere is required touching the preparation and consideration of appropriations and, you might say, touching revenue bills. We are handicapped, however, by the Constitution of the United States in any provision that might be reported. I think it was a very great mistake when the Constitution was made that it contained a provision that while revenue bills and, for that matter, appropriation bills should originate in the House of Representatives, yet they should be subject to amendment by the Senate of the United States, because it divides the authority. I believe that the rules of the House might be so modified that there would be responsibility with power, which we can not hope to bring about as long as we have a half dozen committees making or recommending appropriation bills for the consideration of the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman recall at what period it was that the right of appropriation was taken away from one committee and given to another?

Mr. CANNON. I think it was in the Forty-ninth Congress; either the Forty-ninth or the Forty-eighth. Mr. Carlisle was the Speaker at the time, Mr. Morrison was the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and the appropriation bills went by amendment of the rules to six different committees. I shall not go into the whys and wherefores. I can not cover much ground in five minutes' time. There is a desire in the country that there should be a change somewhere that would give power coupled with responsibility. My own judgment is that the House of Representatives, which touches the people every two years and responds to public sentiment, should alone, if possible, have the power to originate revenue and appropriation bills. I sometimes doubt the propriety of having two committees—one on Ways and Means and one on Appropriations. I am not sure but that there should be one committee, call it what you may, the Ways and Means Committee or any other name, that should look after the revenues and recommend the appropriations, thereby combining the two activities, so that the legislation to get the money for revenue should from time to time be so enacted that, so to speak, one hand could watch the other. We are handicapped about it, however, under existing conditions, and I fear under any conditions that might lead to a reform which would bring better results, by the fact that the Executive can exercise such power as he sometimes does by the veto. I am not now speaking of the present Executive alone, but I refer to the man who is elected for four years to be President of the United States. Sometimes the Democrats elect him and sometimes the Republicans elect him, and I disclaim any intention to directly or indirectly criticize the present Executive at this time, because he has been operating not only under war conditions and war powers of the President but under all the other conditions that Presidents in later years have been called upon to act. However, that power, resting in the President of the United States, under Republican rule or Democratic rule, with the vast patronage that the Executive has, exercising the veto power, requiring two-thirds of both Houses to pass over his veto legislation that he has vetoed, has resulted in two things—one in strengthening unduly the power of the Senate and the other in strengthening unduly the power of the Executive.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MADDEN). The time of the gentleman has expired?

Mr. CANNON. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois two minutes more.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may have five minutes, not to be counted in the time. I want to ask him some questions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes, not to be counted out of the time of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes in addition to the two minutes yielded him by the gentleman from Kansas. The gentleman is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A suggestion has been made that the Ways and Means Committee and Appropriations Committee should be one committee. That is going back to 1865. If that were accomplished, would not that really make a budget committee of itself?

Mr. CANNON. More nearly than in any other way I can think of.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman think that one committee could transact all the business of the House, both ways and means measures and appropriation bills?

Mr. CANNON. I think that a large committee of 25 members could do the work and report the bills for the consideration of the House perhaps far better than under the present system.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentlemen think the House of Representatives ought to pass a rule that it will not entertain an amendment from the Senate proposing legislation on an appropriation bill unless it comes to us with a two-thirds vote of the Senate, or something of that sort, to stop this everlasting rider business? [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, yes; that or something equivalent to it. But the Senate is not the only sinner in the matter of riders. I think it is safe to say that three-quarters of the legislation of the House is placed on appropriation bills either by special rule, amendment by the Senate, or by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think the House ought to pass a rule providing that the Committee on Rules shall not report to the House a rider on an appropriation bill?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think that is one remedy that should be considered. But we come down here, 435 of us, and instead of each committee being an intelligent committee, all considering matters of legislation and reporting them to the House and letting the House pass on them, so that they may be enacted or may fail upon their merits, the sin is that with slight consideration legislation comes in, in the shape of a rider, and gentlemen, not after full and intelligent investigation, take it for granted that the Committee on Appropriations, or some one of them, have considered it, and that they—the committees—know better than we do, and the matter not having been investigated by the proper committee that has charge of the legislation, there is much bad legislation or imperfect legislation finally enacted.

Now, one further word before I sit down. A budget, a budget, a budget is cried for everywhere in the country, and I get letters from a great many people who would not know a budget if they should meet it in the middle of the street. [Laughter.] That is one of the things you have got to contend with.

I want to say that a budget is only effective where if the supply bills and the revenue bills fail then the Government changes by going to the country. That is the English system. The ministry is the Government and proposes the budget, and if it fails in passing the House of Commons the House ceases to exist and the people vote for and a new House is elected that sustains the ministry—that is, the Government—and if the Government is not sustained by a popular vote a new ministry is formed in harmony with the popular vote. We can not do that under our Constitution, because the President holds office for four years. One-third of the Senate goes out every two years. The House goes out every two years. The House meets the criticism of the country when frequently it is unable to control, although we are chiefly held responsible. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] to be disposed of as he may elect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, during every Congress of which I have been a Member I am firmly convinced there was a majority in favor of some sort of budget arrangement. It seems to be one of those legislative proposals which everybody favors and is yet afraid of.

Now, let me say this: You are not going to put through this House any budget plan which takes away from the great committees of this House the jurisdiction they now possess under the rules and which centralizes that power and jurisdiction in the Committee on Appropriations or any other committee. If that is the thought of the proponents of this resolution, they might as well stop here and now, for the House will always kill such a proposal, and in my judgment ought to kill such proposal.

Mr. Speaker, there is now and always has been plenty of work for each and every one of the active committees of the House. It would be humanly impossible for any one committee to do the work of all these appropriating committees unless you made that committee as big as the House itself. If, therefore, any committee is dreaming of more power, it is, in my judgment, destined to have a rude awakening. You are not going to abolish any of the committees now charged with the duty of proposing appropriations. But you can and ought to do this: You can work out a plan by which all bills and resolutions carrying appropriations must pass through some one committee acting after the manner of a great legislative clearing house, invested with ample powers and charged with the duty of preventing duplication in appropriations. It is not impossible to work out such a plan. Indeed, I will go further, and say it is not very difficult to work out such a plan, and my prediction is that is as far as you are ever going to get. This House is not going to tolerate any greater concentration of power in the Appropriations Committee [applause] or any other committee. You may be able to put through a plan taking from each of the appropriating committees a representative and thereby creating a committee in addition to those already existing, charged with the duty of preventing duplication. In my judgment you may be able to get the House to accept some such plan, but you are not going back to the old system of requiring all appropriations to originate in the Committee on Appropriations. Of course, this budget plan is not new. The former chairmen of the Committee on Appropriations, Messrs. Fitzgerald and Sherley, both great legislators, urged the adoption of this budget system. The Democratic minority of this House will support the pending resolution, for the platform of our party has already pledged us to support the budget system. The national platform of 1916 declared in favor of the budget as an instrumentality of economy. We of the minority of the Committee on Rules very cheerfully supported the resolution now before the House. There are obstacles in the way, very serious obstacles. I can see the senatorial rider looming large in the way of any budget plan, but the reform should come and it will come if the friends of the reform stand firm in its favor. [Applause.]

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think a budget committee a move in the right direction, and that some form of budget should be inaugurated by the Congress of the United States, although it is going to take a pretty big committee to properly analyze the expenditures of a Congress like the last one, for instance, where the appropriations ran into the billions.

Mr. Speaker, it has been my observation in a public career of 25 years that the Congress of the United States is not extravagant, the opinion to the contrary notwithstanding. That the expenditures of Congress are more carefully watched than in many large business enterprises is to my mind clear, and this fact is evident where there has been any investigation of big enterprise, whether it was a railroad or a great big industrial enterprise. I think at this time that it is the wise thing to say to the business interests which have petitioned for a budget system for the House of Representatives and the Senate that it would be a very wise thing if they cleaned their own houses. There is a very general feeling that big business is largely responsible for present high cost of living conditions. We read every day in the newspapers that many large business establishments are being taken over by banking syndicates; that many things that we eat, many things that we wear, and many things that we use are being capitalized and are being sold on the stock exchange at fictitious prices.

It is time, I say, that those gentlemen who petition us to reform the budget should reform their own practices, because every home in the Nation to-day is being taxed because of the insidious practices of big businesses in this country. [Applause.] They take millions of dollars of property and turn them into tens of millions of dollars, and in order to meet the dividends that must be paid on these inflated securities every home in the land is taxed. Mr. Speaker, apropos of the question of expenditures by the House, I want to call attention to the care that Congress exercises. I am on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Every Member of this House knows that as a matter of justice and humanity this Government should appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars to house properly the people who are employed by this Government, but because of the economy of the Rules Committee not a dollar will be appropriated in this session, though in almost every part of the United States—in my own city, for example—men and women are compelled to do work for the United States Government in places where when I was mayor of that city, if I had obeyed the health regulations, I would have closed those buildings up.

And the mayor of that city to-day should close many of the public buildings owned and controlled by the United States Government, because they are killing by inches men and women employed by the Government. But the Committee on Rules said, "No; we will permit no new buildings at this session." At the present time thousands of employees throughout the various navy yards in the country are thrown out of work. They are here now. I talked with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy this morning, and he said to me, "Mr. FITZGERALD, it is not the fault of the Navy Department; it is not the fault of the Committee on Naval Affairs that thousands of men are thrown out of work now. It is the fault of the steering committee on the part of the Republican majority of this House."

In conclusion I would say that while this House tolerates a steering committee which dictates the policy of the House on the matter of expenditures a budget committee will not be as effective as it should be. By all means let us have a budget committee representative of both sides of the House rather than a partisan steering committee and the whole country will be the gainer. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I do not believe that the need of a budget system will be resisted anywhere unless it would be on the floor of this House or probably in the Senate. I think that it is almost universally conceded that there ought to be a change in the making of the estimates, in our method of auditing accounts, and especially in the effort to make some relationship between the income and the outgo of the Nation. There is a wide diversity, however, on the method to be accepted or adopted to do this. Our Government is the greatest business on the earth to-day. It handles a greater amount of money. It is certainly more attenuated in the manner of its handling the money than any other business in the world, and a budget system that would be of help to sane business methods would not be resisted by any first-class business anywhere that is responsible for the running of it as a successful concern, but would not attempt to proceed a month without a budget plan. But when we talk about adopting a plan that is in vogue, say, in France or in Great Britain and apply it to our system, it would be difficult to do it for reasons suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. We can not take any ready-made scheme that has been at work in other countries and engraft it upon ours. These plans may serve as suggestions and should doubtless do so, but our system of government is not theirs. There are a great number of proposals, one by this school of business transactions and another by still another school. Economists do not all agree on one plan, but they are a unit on the need of some plan. We have everything here except unity. What we are trying to do in this resolution is to gather from the various proposals offered from time to time through a committee information to clarify these various suggestions and put them into a specific proposal in form of a report, if not a bill, and get action by a certain time by having the findings of this committee brought here upon the floor of the House. Instead of taking up any specific plan that was suggested by any particular chairman of any particular committee or any Member of the House interested in the reform, we have here recommended that the House appoint a committee charged with the responsibility of bringing to this House a plan of budget not later than the 1st of March of next year and give us time to consider it favorably before we enter upon the fiscal year next following that date. I think that the country will be satisfied with this step to bring a specific result before a specific time. Nobody will question that this will be done. And those heretofore who would charge that this is simply to defer the matter and nothing definite is to come out of it will have no foundation for that charge now. A budget system must be adopted. This Congress is taking the proper step to assure that it will now be accomplished in due time without undue delay. I am quite certain that this is a specific recommendation to which the House ought unanimously to agree. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, perhaps it is presumptuous for a Member of the House who has not given any more study to this proposition than I have to take up the time of the House to discuss it. I want to say that I favor this resolution. I am in favor of the appointment of a committee to study this question. We have discussed it here for the last four or five years, ever since I have been a Member of Congress, and perhaps it has been discussed longer than that. I know that two honored former chairmen of the Appropriations Committee favored it. Congressman Fitzgerald, of New York, made an extended speech here in favor of the budget system, and I believe, if I recollect aright, proposed either a separate bill or an amendment to some bill. I recall that at the last session the then chairman, Mr. Sherley, of Kentucky, proposed an amendment, and, as I recall, it passed the House but was not finally enacted into law. I know the Democratic platform has had provisions in it at various times favoring a budget system. I know of no one who opposes it. We differ on the plan.

Now, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing that so much as to express a certain fear which I have. I would not be frank with myself or the Members of the House unless I did that upon this occasion. Nearly every budget system that I have heard discussed here has led to the door of the Committee on Appropriations, and I want to warn the Members of the House against that. If a budget committee means the enlargement of the Appropriations Committee, and if all the power of originating appropriations is centered in that one committee, let me warn the Members of the House that the rest of us, who are not upon the Rules Committee and the Appropriations Committee, might just as well pack our baggage and go home. It will mean that you will have no other way to secure legislation here. It means too much power centered in the Appropriations Committee and the Rules Committee. It means that the other Members of Congress will have mighty little to say concerning legislation upon the floor of the House.

Now, the budget committee that I would be in favor of would be composed of representatives, if not the heads, of the various departments of this Government. Let them get together and make careful estimates and through the Treasury Department submit the amounts to meet the requirements of the Government, but an amount not to exceed the anticipated revenues for that year. Then you will have a budget system. Keep your expenditures within your revenues and limit the amount that any department can estimate for.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have only five minutes.

Mr. LAYTON. Do you not think if you leave the question of appropriations to the heads of the departments it would run this country overwhelmingly in debt?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is what I am trying to get to now; that is what I want to criticize, if you will let me get to it. If you have only one committee and they have not time to study all of these questions, necessarily they will have to depend on the departments. They will have no inside information about it and will have to take what the departments say to them.

Let us take, for illustration, the three committees—Agriculture, Post Office, and Indian. What does the Appropriations Committee know about agriculture? The members of the Committee on Agriculture know more about it in five minutes than the members of the Appropriations Committee will know in a lifetime, and I would rather trust them. But if a budget system means an appropriation committee being a budget committee, then the appropriation committee will be at the mercy of the Department of Agriculture and the heads of the various bureaus and can not originate any affirmative legislation. The same is true of the others.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am sorry I have not sufficient time to discuss it, but I will do so at some future time, along the line that you could not get any other legislation through unless it comes from the Rules Committee. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, just one word more; I trust that I make my position clear. While I favor this resolution and while I favor a budget system, I do not favor centering all the appropriations of Congress in the Appropriations Committee. This committee is necessarily a very busy one. If it has not in the past given any special study to the needs of the Department of Agriculture, the Post Office Department, the Indian Bureau, the War Department, or the Navy Department, and if the estimates of any one of these departments are referred to the Appropriations Committee, without having any special information, the committee would be at the mercy of the representatives of the department appearing before it to justify the estimates. The House would then be under the complete domination of the departments. Through years of investigation the Committee on Agriculture have accumulated much valuable information, helpful to members of the committee in deciding upon increases or decreases. You can make a bureau or department more efficient and keep a better check over it if you have given a committee familiar with its work the task of passing upon the various items making up its appropriation.

You take the Indian Bureau as an example. I trust that I may be pardoned for suggesting that there are Members on the Indian Committee who have been on it for 20 years and who have an intimate knowledge of Indian affairs. They are not at the mercy of the representatives of the Indian Bureau, because members of the committee know what appropriations are needed and why they are needed. Suppose appropriations for this bureau were made by the Appropriations Committee. Its members would be at the mercy of the legislative representative of the Indian Bureau. This applies to all the other departments.

Take, as another example, the Post Office Department. Everyone knows there are Members on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads who are thoroughly familiar with the workings of that great department. They are not solely dependent upon the heads of bureaus for information. They know for themselves what is needed.

If a budget system means looking into the door of the Appropriations Committee, by the enlargement of that committee and letting that committee originate all the appropriations, it means more power to the various departments, and it means departmental rule.

A committee thoroughly familiar with the detailed workings of a great department can greatly increase the efficiency of various bureaus by increasing the appropriations where needed, and can hold in check other bureaus by decreasing the appropriations where the bureaus are inefficient.

There are 435 Members of the House, and if all appropriations are to originate in the Appropriations Committee, with the exception of the Rules Committee, the other Members might as well be at home. Of course the members of the Rules Committee are very powerful. They can bring in a pocketful of rules each day making certain legislation in order or adding certain legislative measures as riders to appropriation bills. It has been asserted during this debate that legislation by rider amendments is highly objectionable, with which sentiment everybody agrees. However much you criticize legislation by riders to appropriation bills, permit me to say that it is almost the only way to get any legislation of a local character.

I will surprise a number of the new Members of the House by saying to them that you can not get a bill through this House except by unanimous consent. The country does not know this or it would not stand for such procedure. If anybody contradicts this statement, suppose you turn to the older Member beside you and ask him, or ask the Speaker or the parliamentarian or a member of the Rules Committee, if you introduce a bill of a local character, how you would proceed to get that bill considered. You will be amazed when he tells you that you have only two ways. The first is by unanimous consent, to obtain which you address the House and ask for unanimous consent to consider the bill. If one Member objects, your request is denied. The other way is to have the bill placed on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, if it is a public bill. This calendar is considered two Mondays in each month. When the Unanimous Consent Calendar is called, and you have remained in your seat four hours or more awaiting the bill to be reached, the bill is not considered if one Member of the House objects.

Now, the only other way to have the bill considered is by bringing it up on Calendar Wednesday. The various committees are called in order and each committee has two Calendar Wednesdays in succession. We have about 40 committees. If the Agricultural Committee is called and some important bill is reported and it is not concluded on the first Calendar Wednesday and the second Calendar Wednesday is required for its consideration, then in all probability the committee will not be reached again during the whole session of Congress. Hence there is no way to reach the bill reported by the committee in which the Member is interested.

You take the committee of which I am a member—the Indian Committee. It was only reached upon call one time in the Sixty-fifth Congress. The time was then taken up in the consideration of the sale of the coal lands in the Choctaw Nation. The committee was not reached upon any other Calendar Wednesday. No other Indian legislation could be called up except by unanimous consent or by placing amendments upon appropriation bills. These amendments have been added both in the House and in the Senate for the past 25 years, if not longer. While there is much objection to legislation by riders placed on appropriation bills, yet this practice is frequently justified.

I have offered an amendment to the rules. It has been referred to the Rules Committee. If adopted it will prevent any one Member from objecting to consideration of a bill placed upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar. There is no sense to the rule as it now stands. It ought to be amended now. Nobody can defend it. Nobody dare go before the people and attempt to defend it. Under the present rules you can not get a local bill except in the ways just mentioned. The Rules Committee will not bring in a special rule for a local bill.

If the various departments, through their heads or through some expert especially appointed for the purpose, were required to make careful estimates of the needs of the departments, with the knowledge that under no circumstances could the estimates in the aggregate exceed the anticipated revenues, and these revenues were apportioned in an equitable way suitable to the needs and requirements of the various departments, and then when these estimates, after being carefully gone over and checked and rechecked and all duplication of work eliminated, were referred by the Speaker to the various committees familiar with the working of the several departments, such as we now have, I think the best results could be obtained.

I am opposed to the concentration of the affairs of the House in the Appropriations Committee and the Rules Committee. I am opposed to giving the departments further power, as making a budget committee out of the Appropriations Committee would do, because that committee would be at the mercy of the various departments and would be compelled to make the appropriations suggested, as no detailed information would be available except that furnished by the departments.

I favor an independent budget system or commission, but when the estimates are submitted I want them referred to appropriation committees like we now have in the House. I want such committees to scrutinize the estimates and report the appropriation bills. If the Appropriations Committee is made a budget committee, it means an enlargement of that committee. It means various subcommittees and a concentration of all the work of the House in that one committee. While I favor this resolution and while I favor the budget system, I want to make my position clear. I do not favor the centralization of all this authority in one committee of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Twelve minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am heartily in favor of the adoption of this resolution. Sometimes we hear it suggested that the serious evils about which we complain in relation to a Federal budget are lodged entirely in the executive departments. I think that is a mistake. The crux of the whole matter is found in the Senate and House. Here, in the midst of our legislative program, we will find the opportunity of rendering our best service for a budget system.

Some bills have proposed the consideration and determination of an auditing system and a budget system together. That is also a very serious mistake. They are separate and independent propositions. If we undertake to recast the accounting system of the Government as it now stands while we draft a budget system, there will be endless confusion and a greater loss than gain. Let me state a proposition for you.

Place before your mind a debit and credit statement. On the debit side of that account enumerate the expenditures of the Government. Take the bills that are introduced in the House and in the Senate. There is $500,000,000 for the improvement of land for homes to soldiers; two or three hundred millions of dollars is proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts for a public-building bill in the present Congress. After completing that debit side of the statement, add to it the absolutely necessary expenses for the running of the Government. Strike the total. Then take the total of your estimated revenue, and the chances are you could not pay your bills at 50 cents on the dollar with that kind of a statement. That debit and credit statement should stand before the eyes of every committee handling appropriations and every Member as he votes for the expenditure of public money. If that debit and credit statement were clearly in view, we would never think of considering for one minute many propositions that are brought forth in seriousness on the floor of this House.

Some years ago a distinguished statesman said that if the Government were directed along business lines we could reduce the expenses of the Government $300,000,000 a year. That was a very unfortunate and a very inaccurate statement. For a considerable period of time after I heard it I studied the appropriations in the expenditures of the Government with reference to that suggestion. We were then paying out of the general fund of the Treasury about $700,000,000 a year. That did not touch the postal expenses. Think of it, my friends! Reduce $700,000,000 of annual expenditures by $300,000,000, nearly one-half—an absolute impossibility! That was a misleading statement. If, my friends, we can not save $500,000,000 even under existing conditions, we might save $100,000,000. That would be quite worth while. If we could save $50,000,000, that would be quite worth while, or $25,000,000.

Some of the pending bills seek to make the accounting system a part of the budget system. If those bills should be adopted in their present form they would emasculate the present accounting system of the Government, increase expenses unnecessarily, and lead to serious confusion throughout the executive branches of the Government. If a budget system should be developed as an independent proposition and the accounting system should be utilized in the application and enforcement of the budget system we would secure the best possible results. I heartily concur with the general opinion that the accounting system should be under the jurisdiction and control of Congress. Of course, we all understand that the accounting officers have been under the jurisdiction and control of the Treasury Department from the organization of the Government to the present time. In recent years, however, the business of the Government has developed to such enormous proportions that the necessity for more thorough inspection by the committees on expenditures of the House and the Senate has increased correspondingly. We now have an accounting system which works smoothly and efficiently. It has been molded into the details of the business affairs of all the executive branches of the Government. It was established by provisions carried in the legislative act approved July 31, 1894 (28 Stat., p. 26). The joint commission that had charge of that revision consisted of six members, three on the part of the House—Dockery of Missouri, Richardson of Tennessee, Dingley of Maine—and three on the part of the Senate—Cockrell of Missouri, Jones of Arkansas, and Cullom of Illinois. The accountants employed by the commission were J. W. Reinhart, C. W. Haskins, and E. W. Sells. The report of the commission appears in House Document No. 637, Fifty-third Congress, second session, and contains specific recommendations of the commission and accountants.

It is unfortunate that so many public officials fail to appreciate the real value and importance of the accounting offices of the Government. I have met Cabinet officers, judges of courts, Senators, and Members of Congress who entertain the belief that the chief business of the accounting offices is to post and add debits and credits.

Clerks and employees have been assigned to the rolls of accounting offices at times when they have been found absolutely useless elsewhere and at other times without special consideration of the important duties that they are expected to perform under the law. If those offices should be placed under the jurisdiction and control of Congress and vacancies should be filled upon their rolls by the appointment of accountants, a degree of efficiency could be readily secured that would result in practical economy. Such an arrangement would be very helpful to every committee of the House and Senate. Thus a trained force would be ready at all times to assist in the prompt and efficient application of the rules embodied in a practical budget system. But what will a budget system accomplish unless there can be a unification of the Committees on Appropriations in the House and the Senate? There must be a common clearing house, with debits and credits clearly disclosing the resources and liabilities of the Government. Every appropriation bill should be considered in direct comparison with the funds available for its payment. When all of the estimates shall have been supplied and totaled they should be placed in comparison with the total estimated revenues for the period to be covered by the appropriations. The pertinent question, therefore, is, How much will each committee now controlling appropriations be willing to surrender and contribute to a common clearing house? What will be accomplished if the committees are left as they are now? It has been a very common habit to charge that the executive departments are solely responsible for extravagance and that Congress is the only economical agency in the country. We can not consistently maintain such a claim as that while we make appropriations here through so many channels as to invite and incur duplications that may exceed the waste in the executive branches of the service. It is to be hoped that the committee proposed by the pending resolution will find ways and means to correct all these difficulties and show the way to a larger measure of efficiency and economy in the public service.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, may I have permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the appointment of a budget committee, as proposed, is very highly important. I am very glad, indeed, that the House is to take this definite step toward the consideration of legislation having to do with estimates and appropriations. I am not one of those who imagine that it is going to be possible immediately to overturn and entirely revolutionize the practice of the House of Representatives long established or through one piece of legislation. I believe legislation improving the methods of estimating and appropriating should be legislation along carefully thought out evolutionary lines, and I shall hope that this committee will make its first report to Congress early after the House reconvenes. I hope it will see its way clear at an early date to take at least one definite forward step toward improving the present unsatisfactory situation. [Applause.]

I do not want to take up the time of the House to discuss this matter further at this time, but I shall extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD an article on the subject of the budget which I recently contributed to the magazine the Federal Employee, and which was published in the July number of that magazine, and which is as follows:

THE BUDGET SYSTEM—WHAT THE BUDGET SYSTEM IS AND WHAT IS PROPOSED UNDER IT DISCUSSED BY THE MAJORITY FLOOR LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—THE BUDGET SYSTEM AS IT EXISTS IN OTHER COUNTRIES AND ITS ADAPTATION TO OUR OWN GOVERNMENT, AND THE SERIOUS SHORTCOMINGS IN OUR PRESENT PROCEDURE, ARE TREATED IN THE LIGHT OF AN INTIMATE KNOWLEDGE AND CLOSE GRASP OF THE SITUATION GAINED THROUGH YEARS OF FACE-TO-FACE EXPERIENCE WITH THE BIG PROBLEMS EVER PRESSING HARDER FOR A COMPREHENSIVE SOLUTION.

According to the dictionaries the word "budget" is derived from the French word "bougette," which means "a little bag." Among financial writers it is a term in common usage relating to the financial administration of governments, local and national, corporations, and other bodies which have to deal with the question of raising and expending money. The term was first used by the British, and according to tradition the pouch in which the chancellor of the exchequer carried his financial papers to Parliament was called "the budget."

THE BUDGET SYSTEM ABROAD—MUST VARY WITH CONDITIONS.

The budget system is quite commonly in vogue in all those countries which have the parliamentary form of government. As the foreigner understands the budget, it is the financial program prepared and presented to the legislature by the executive branch of the government under the jurisdiction of the minister of finance. In these countries the members of the executive government are also members of the legislature, so that legislative approval of the budget means the approval of the work of the leaders of its own body. In such cases there would be little or no committee examination of the proposed expenditures before the estimates were laid before the legislature for final action.

It must be borne in mind, however, that there is no uniform and ideal budget system that can be put into effect in all countries. There are, indeed, certain general principles of financial administration which are recognized as being desirable, but the application of these to national institutions have given a great variety of budget plans. No two countries have exactly the same system.

BUDGET PLANS FOR OUR OWN GOVERNMENT OUTLINED.

The term as applied to the Government of the United States means the application of these principles to our system of financial administration in a way that will give us a procedure having many of the elements of the budget system as understood abroad, but at the same time would preserve our traditional conception of the relationship of governmental powers. In other words, not having a parliamentary system of government and having a Congress which under the Constitution is given the sole power and responsibility over the Public Treasury, it would not be possible for us to have a budget prepared entirely by the Executive and presented to Congress for action without change. It is true that under the Constitution the President may from time to time recommend to Congress measures for their consideration, and under this clause he could present a budget, but Congress, on the other hand, would, under the Constitution, be obliged to examine the budget and make it their own.

There have been many suggestions and several plans for a national budget system for our Government, and there is now quite a widespread interest for some reform along these lines. These suggestions and plans deal with three distinct phases of our financial procedure:

First, the preparation of the estimates of expenditure by the departments.

Second, the legislative procedure in making appropriations by Congress.

Third, the audit and control over the expenditure of the money by the various disbursing officers in the departments.

DEFECTS IN PRESENT SYSTEM OF HANDLING ESTIMATES.

It is quite generally agreed that the present method of preparing and presenting the annual estimates is unbusinesslike and unscientific and is conducive to extravagance and waste. Briefly, the existing procedure is as follows:

The various bureaus, boards, or offices of the Government some time in the late summer or early fall make up their own estimates as to what they desire to spend for the coming fiscal year. The head of each bureau is, of course, enthusiastic over the work of his organization and desires to see it expand and grow. This desire is translated into his estimates. The estimates for each bureau, or other subdivision, are next sent to the head of the department for sanction. Now the head of the department has no organization or machinery for the close scrutiny and revision of the estimates of his subordinates; therefore he gives formal approval to the estimates. It would be impossible for him to give them a personal examination, and it would be impossible for him in any case to pass valid judgment on estimates based on technical information. Furthermore, the head of the department has no particular responsibility for the estimates, since the whole thing will be thrashed out before a committee of Congress having jurisdiction over that department. This fact also has an influence on the bureau chief who prepares the estimates in the first place. It is the common practice to attempt to anticipate revisions by the committee by padding the estimates; that is to say, by estimating somewhat above the actual needs of the bureau.

Some time in October all the estimates for the Government are required to be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized to collate them and print them in what is known as the Book of Estimates. The significant feature of this procedure is that the Secretary of the Treasury has no power whatever to revise or to suggest revisions in the estimates. His work is purely formal. He is required by law to transmit the estimates to Congress, and when they reach Congress they represent not a scientific, businesslike financial statement of the rock-bottom needs of the Government for the coming fiscal year, but they represent in terms of finance the aspirations and the ambitions of the various bureaus and offices of the Government, each proceeding without reckoning with the needs of the other and the whole conglomeration being compiled without any relation to the prospective revenue of the Government.

Advocates of budget reform agree without exception that something should be done toward the creation of some centralized agency in the executive Government which would have the power in the name of the President to control the preparation of these estimates at their source; to coordinate them with each other and with the revenues; to revise them when necessary either by the enforcement of reductions or by complete elimination. There are several bills now before Congress containing this provision under the name of a budget bureau.

BRITISH SYSTEM IN COMPARISON WITH OUR OWN.

It may be interesting to compare the British procedure in the preparation of the annual estimates with our own. The British treasury is one of the oldest financial institutions in the world, and they have been proceeding under a budget system for several hundred years. It is given complete control in behalf of the taxpayers over the preparation of the annual estimates. It is divided into six divisions, each division having jurisdiction over a certain number of the government departments. At the head of each division is a financial expert, who has worked his way up in the civil service from lower financial positions. He is a man thoroughly familiar with the financial operations and the general work of the departments over which he is placed. He is in constant and direct communication with the officer in the bureau or office who is responsible for the finances of that bureau. He does not control the actions of this officer, nor has he any power to interfere with the operations of the office. His function is purely financial. The financial officer in the bureau is, however, responsible to the treasury in the first place for efficient financial administration. He can not evade this responsibility by obeying his political chief. He can absolve himself when he makes an expenditure against his conscience and judgment only by making a reservation in writing to the treasury, setting forth his objections. In the preparation of the estimates this officer consults the treasury official over him. He can not put any new item into the estimates of the year without first obtaining written sanction from the treasury. The treasury exercises the power of revision, reduction, and elimination, but only in matters not involving questions of government policy. With these latter the treasury has nothing to do. When the cabinet has decided on the expenditure of a certain sum of money for a given purpose it is the duty of the treasury to see that the estimates for the expenditure of this money are drawn up in a businesslike fashion in accordance with economy and efficiency. In this way when the British estimates are presented to Parliament they have already been carefully revised and reduced to as low a figure as the Government proposes to stand responsible for.

The budget bureau provided in the plans now before Congress is intended to accomplish the kind of result described above. The need for some such system of controlling the estimates of the departments is keenly felt at this time, when the Government is proceeding on such a tremendous scale of operation and when the burden of taxation on the people to meet these estimates is heavier than it has ever been before.

HOW CONGRESS DEALS WITH ESTIMATES AND APPROPRIATIONS.

The next step in our financial procedure is the consideration of the estimates by Congress and the passage of appropriation bills to meet the needs of the Government. In the early years of our governmental operations the estimates were submitted to one committee and were reported out and passed by Congress in the form of a single appropriation bill. At that time the Government was small and might easily be housed in a single moderately sized building. In the course of time estimates were divided up into a number of appropriation bills, until now we have 14 annual appropriation bills. At the close of the Civil War the Ways and Means Committee, which had had jurisdiction over both revenue and appropriations since 1796, surrendered its jurisdiction over appropriation bills to the newly created Appropriations Committee, and in 1885 the jurisdiction over appropriations was divided among the eight committees which now prepare and report appropriation bills. Each of these committees holds hearings on that portion of the estimates relating to the department over which it has jurisdiction. The departmental officials are called before the committee and examined in hearings, which are afterwards printed. At these hearings the members of the committee, under their constitutional responsibility, attempt to gain the information which will lead them to a proper decision on the questions involved. In other words, the duty of the committee is to write into an appropriation bill the actual amounts of money which the department must operate with during the coming year. The committee knows that it has not before it a real financial program, but, rather, requests for money in the shape of unrevised and uncoordinated estimates, and it finds itself in a very difficult position. With the operations of the Government spreading out into every field of activity and involving every form of mechanical and scientific technique, the committee is unable to criticize or judge intelligently the estimates for many of the bureaus.

This need is proposed to be met under present budget plans by giving to the committee an administrative organization of experts under the proposed reform of the control and auditing system, which will be discussed later.

SHOULD THERE BE MORE THAN ONE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE?

One of the prevailing criticisms against the present system of congressional procedure is that there are too many committees having jurisdiction over finance, and that there is a lack of unity and cooperation between them. Suggestions have been made for a single budget or appropriation committee, and other suggestions have been made for a sort of superfinance committee, to be composed of the chairmen of the various committees having jurisdiction over finance, which would meet and consider the financial program as a whole and then apportion it out to the respective committees. If, however, the budget bureau is formally established with adequate powers of control over the estimates the need of committee coordination in Congress would be much less than it is now, for in that case each committee would be dealing with revised estimates representing the actual needs of the Government, and to that extent the committees would be relieved of much of their hardest work.

Although the single committee idea appears to be logically ideal, opinion varies as to whether it could efficiently do the work even though it were divided up into a large number of subcommittees. At any rate the establishment of a budget system would not begin with a change in the committee system. After the budget bureau is established and the audit system put under the control of Congress it will more clearly appear exactly what committee changes will be necessary. In a reform so important to the Government, involving as it were the very foundation of our administrative system and affecting the control over the expenditure of billions of dollars per annum and the taxation of the whole people, it would seem to be better policy to proceed with caution. It is quite possible to work out a budget system adaptable to our form of government and to our institutions without putting a logically complete scheme into operation at one time.

GOVERNMENT AUDIT SYSTEM SHOULD BE UNDER CONGRESS.

Practically all advocates of a national budget system agree that Congress should take over the control of the system of audit of the accounts of the Government.

Under our system the executive spends the money and also controls the auditing system which audits the executive accounts. There are six independent auditors, each appointed by the President and removable by him. While there has been no serious criticism of the work of our auditors it is considered poor business administration to have the executive audit his own accounts. Audit in the true sense implies a control from without, and it is the common practice of foreign Governments to have the legislature, which grants the money to the executive, control the system of audit. Under our system the Comptroller of the Treasury is also an executive officer, although it is his function to interpret the will of Congress in financial legislation to the executive departments. There are several plans before Congress dealing with this question. They quite generally agree on the following points:

First. That there should be a consolidation of the auditing force under one head official, who should exercise the functions of the present Comptroller of the Treasury and of an auditor general.

Second. That this officer should be regarded as an official of Congress, should hold office during good behavior, and should be removable therefrom only by vote of Congress.

Third. That the experts under him, who would be placed in the various offices of the Government where the money appropriated by Congress is being spent, should be at the call of the committees of Congress when the estimates for the department in question are under consideration.

This would give the committee at the hearings the expert assistance which they now lack. They would have there an officer thoroughly familiar with the financial operations of the executive branch under consideration. He would not be a part of that branch but would in his work and in his viewpoint represent the legislative branch. In other words, he would be the eye of Congress on the disbursing officer and on the financial plans of the particular bureau or bureaus whose accounts he was assigned to audit.

ESSENTIALS OF BUDGET SYSTEM AND ANTICIPATED RESULTS.

These three features—the preparation of the annual estimates, the procedure in Congress in relation to them, and the control over the expenditures through an organization with powers of control and audit—constitute the essential elements of a modern budget system that can be applied under our form of government. Advocates of this system maintain that it would give us the following results:

First. A view of the finances of the Government as a whole at all stages of the procedure.

Second. The submission to Congress of a financial statement of the actual needs of the Government which has been prepared under the President's direction and upon his responsibility by a budget bureau.

Third. The consideration of these estimates by Congress with such revision of its rules as would provide for a consideration of the budget as a whole both in relation of department to department and of the total expenditures to the total revenues.

Fourth. It would put into the hands of Congress, through the consolidation of the control and auditing system, a highly expert and efficient organization, which would enable Congress to gain a clearer view of the financial operations of the Government.

The official at the head of this department would have the powers of the present Comptroller of the Treasury as well as the powers of an auditor general and would be the strong arm of Congress extending over the mechanical, technical, and scientific aspects of the detailed expenditures of all moneys appropriated out of the Public Treasury. This in brief is the sort of budget system which is likely to be adopted in this country.

BUDGET SYSTEMS ESTABLISHED RECENTLY IN MANY STATES.

It may be of interest to note that the movement for budgetary reform has gained considerable headway among the State governments. Since 1917 14 States have established budget systems for their financial administration, and 7 others have movements on foot in this direction, while several other States had budget systems before 1917.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that budgetary legislation is an assured thing at this session of Congress. Both political parties have declared for it. Practically every chamber of commerce and board of trade in the United States has passed resolutions favoring it. The business interests of the country and the taxpayers, who are feeling the weight of taxation as they have never felt it before, are demanding that our system of finance shall be improved, in order that all waste, or as much waste and extravagance as is possible to eliminate, may be eliminated.

I think there is no question upon which people's minds differ so greatly as upon this very question. One man will say that we have a good system of Government finance. Another man will say that we have no system at all. Anyone who will study our system of appropriations and expenditures will come to the conclusion that it has serious defects, that it needs some radical changes; it needs to be perfected. But any man who says that we have no system at all knows absolutely nothing about the financial system of the United States and only reveals his ignorance. It does need to be improved by legislation. Now, we have at this time 10 bills and resolutions pending before four different committees of the House. Four of them are pending before the Committee on Rules, dealing largely with changes in the rules of the House, and those changes depend somewhat on legislation amending the statutes and making provision for estimates for appropriations and accounting. Two of them are pending before the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department; two are pending before the Committee on Ways and Means; and two before the Committee on Appropriations. It must be obvious to anyone that we could never get legislation that would be worth anything if it were to come piecemeal from all of these various committees to which these bills were appropriately referred.

Now, this resolution simply does this: It authorizes the creation of a select committee that may take these bills and resolutions and all other measures which may hereafter be introduced dealing with this subject and study them and report to the House, not later than the 1st day of March, some bill or resolution changing the present method of making estimates and appropriations or of the control of appropriations. The extent to which that committee will change the existing laws will, of course, depend altogether upon the matter that is presented to that committee and the conclusions that it may arrive at. But it must be perfectly apparent that four committees of the House can not function upon this great question, and if we are to get the legislation that the country is demanding, that the taxpayers are demanding, that legislation must come from one committee that will have jurisdiction of the entire subject. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the resolution and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The Clerk will report the Garrett amendment.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, may we have the resolution reported again?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be reported again, with amendments, including the Garrett amendment.

House resolution 168.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed to appoint a special committee for the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be known as the select committee on the budget, to which shall be referred for consideration and report all bills, resolutions, and documents for the establishment of a national budget system or proposing changes in present methods of dealing with appropriations, estimates, and expenditures.

The committee shall consist of 12 members, of whom 7 shall be appointed from the majority party and 5 from the minority party.

The committee or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions or recesses of the House, and may have done such printing and binding as may be necessary in connection with the performance of its duties.

The committees of the House of the Sixty-sixth Congress to which have been referred bills and resolutions dealing with the jurisdiction herein authorized shall be relieved from the consideration of such bills and resolutions and the same shall thereupon be referred to the special committee herein provided for.

The committee may report by bill or otherwise to the House of Representatives with any recommendations it shall choose to make and shall have the right to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

First amendment: Page 2, line 3, strike out the words "shall be" and insert in lieu thereof "are hereby."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the same line strike out the word "relieved" and insert in lieu thereof the word "discharged."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "the" at the beginning of the line, insert the word "further."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the word "the" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 9 and 10, strike out the words "and shall have the right to report at any time" and insert in lieu thereof the words "not later than March 1, 1920."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution as amended was agreed to was laid on the table.

ASSESSMENT WORK ON MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a unanimous-consent request before that is put.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas suspend in response to the gentleman's request?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

PERMISSION TO A COMMITTEE TO SIT DURING THE RECESS.

Mr. BROWNING. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Naval Affairs be permitted to sit during the recess of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Naval Affairs be permitted to sit during the recess of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ASSESSMENT WORK ON MINING CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the privileged resolution submitted by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. J. Res. 150, to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1919. The said resolution shall be read; there shall be 20 minutes general debate—10 minutes by those favoring the resolution and 10 minutes by those opposing the resolution. At the conclusion of the general debate the resolution shall be read for amendments under the five-minute rule; at the conclusion of such consideration the committee shall rise, report the resolution, together with any amendments thereto, to the House. Thereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and all amendments thereto to the final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] desire any time on this resolution?

Mr. GARRETT. No. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules and a unanimous report from the Committee on Mines and Mining. The resolution explains itself. I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. According to the wording of the resolution, the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. J. Res. 150, to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1919, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. The Clerk will proceed with the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provision of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States which requires on each mining claim located, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor to be performed or improvements aggregating such amount to be made during each year, be, and the same is hereby, suspended during the calendar year 1919: Provided, That every claimant of any such mining claim in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution shall file or cause to be filed in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded, on or before December 31, 1919, a notice of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution: Provided further, That this resolution shall not apply to oil placer locations or claims.

SEC. 2. That this resolution shall not be construed to alter, modify, amend, or repeal the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service," approved July 17, 1917.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 9, after the figures "1919," insert "Provided, That no such suspension shall be granted to any one claimant for more than five claims"; page 2, line 5, after the word "resolution," strike out "Provided further, That this resolution shall not apply to oil placer locations or claims."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] is recognized for 10 minutes. The rule provides that 10 minutes shall be allowed in favor and 10 minutes in opposition. Is there any member of the committee in opposition to this resolution? If not, is there any Member of the House who desires to control the time?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I presume under the rule the Chair would be compelled to recognize some one on the Committee on Mines and Mining. The committee are unanimous. I have some requests for time on our side from members of the committee and one request from a gentleman who is not a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the terms of the rule 10 minutes are allowed to the opposition. If anybody claims it, the Chair will be compelled to recognize such opposition.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, this is a resolution for the purpose of suspending the doing of assessment work on metalliferous mining claims during the year 1919.

I suppose Members nearly all know that the method of taking up claims and developing mines in the West, especially metalliferous mining claims, is to locate the claim and then make a record of it in the local land office. The law then provides that there must be $100 worth of work done on that claim each year for five years or thereafter until such time as mineral may be found to warrant the patenting of the claim.

In the last Congress a bill was passed through both Houses relieving mining claimants from doing assessment work in 1917 and 1918. In a large number of the mining States the men went to war. They have not all got back yet. Another large number of them went to the shipbuilding industry and other industries at the call of their country to help get out ammunition and other things necessary for the war, and they have not all returned home yet. In fact, the conditions out there in those Northwestern States, especially where there has been so much drought, are not very inviting for people to rush back there when they can secure employment here in the East, as many of them have done, for the time being. All this makes labor very scarce in those States, and what labor there is is attempting to harvest such crops as may be gathered and to build houses and to develop the country and get it back to where it was before the war. That keeps everybody very busy, and as a consequence these men can not be spared from their work to do assessment work in justice to the community and to the States. To take them from their employment and have them go out into the hills and do their assessment work this year would take away man power amounting to several million dollars' worth of work in developing other industries. The Secretary of the Interior has advised that this legislation meets with his approval. It simply extends the time for doing the assessment work by suspension for this year. Next year they are required to do the assessment work just as though they had not owned the claim this year. And so on after that. For the reasons I have stated it is thought by the committee unanimously, after four days' hearing on this subject and listening to the testimony of many men from the western mining States, that this relief should be granted. I think this suspension should be made. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Is it permissible under the resolution for the Member recognized to control the time in opposition to yield part of his time to gentlemen who are in favor of the resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will so hold, provided there is no one asking for time in opposition.

Mr. WALSH. I am in opposition, and I have 10 minutes, but I desire to ask if I can yield part of my time to gentlemen who are in favor of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would so hold, provided there was no one in opposition who wished the time. If anyone desired it, preference would be given to some one in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Under the ruling of the Chair, I will yield four minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for yielding me the time. I am strongly in favor of this legislation. I introduced a resolution which went before the Committee on Public Lands, and was reported on favorably by the Department of the Interior. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] introduced a similar resolution, and there was a question of jurisdiction, and the gentleman from Oregon reintroduced the bill, and it went to the Committee on Mines and Mining. This legislation effects many mining men in California, and in particular the district which I have the honor to represent. I appeared before the Committee on Mines and Mining and gave them what information I had and urged the passage of this resolution.

The district I represent is the great mining district of the United States. We have many placer claims. This law, known as the "placer law," originated in the State of California, under the custom of the miners growing out of the development of placer mining in California. Under present conditions those who filed on their claims or had them in existence before the 1st of January, 1919, would be relieved of doing the assessment work for the year 1919.

The cost of mining material has advanced from 100 to 500 per cent. Mining camps have been abandoned and men have gone to other occupations. They had to. Gold has not increased in price, while every other commodity has increased from 100 to 500 per cent. Men are scarce. While these men are anxious to develop their claims, we think it would be justice to them and a benefit to the Government if they were relieved from doing the annual assessment work for this year.

There will be no injury to the Government, because next year they will be compelled to do the annual assessment work that they would have done this year were it not for the passage of this resolution. If the resolution passes to-day, we hope that it will get before the Senate so that the Senate may pass it before the end of the week, and then these mining men over the country will know what they have to do.

There is just one unfortunate provision in the bill, and that is the first amendment provided for by the committee. In 1918 we passed a joint resolution relieving all mining claimants of assessment work for the years 1917 and 1918 without any question as to the number of claims that any one man might own. This committee has reported a bill, and on page 1 provided an amendment that no such exemptions shall be granted to any one claimant for more than five claims.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not they are required to do this assessment work in a period of five years.

Mr. RAKER. They can do it all the first year if they want to. If a man takes five years, if he does $100 a year and it runs for five years, then he can make his application for a patent.

Mr. RICKETTS. This bill relieving them from assessment work for this year does not relieve them from doing the $500 worth of work?

Mr. RAKER. It does not; it relieves them for this year, and the next year they will have to do the work that they were to do this year.

I hope that while the committee has been so generous in reporting the resolution it can see its way clear not to adopt this first amendment. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman means the remarks he has just made on this resolution?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I would like to revise and extend them a little on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING].

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, this report comes to the House with the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and I hope that the bill will be adopted. One phase of the question has not been discussed, and I want to call attention to it.

In the last Congress we passed a law providing for exemption for men in the military service from the necessity of doing assessment work on mining claims. That law had a provision in it which relieved the soldier from assessment work during the period of his service in the Army and until six months after such soldier is mustered out of the service or until six months after his death.

I want to call attention to this fact: Since the beginning of January and before the beginning of July we discharged from the military establishment in this country something like 2,000,000 men. Every one of these men who have mining claims under the provisions of the law which was passed last year exempting them from the necessity of assessment work will have to do that assessment work during 1919 unless this relief is granted. Whatever may be said as to mining claims in general, I am certain that Congress will want to grant this relief to the men who have been discharged between January 1 of this year and July 1 of this year, because if relief is not granted under the law these men will be obliged to do the assessment work this year, having been out of the service more than six months. I think there is absolutely no reason that can be advanced why this legislation should not be passed.

There is a great scarcity of labor in the mining regions to-day. The men who own these prospecting claims are to-day engaged in productive mining in the metalliferous mines of the West. We need gold, we need silver, we need copper. The prospectors very generally to-day are employed either on the farms or in the production of these precious and much-needed metals. The granting of this exemption, as has been very well stated, does not involve the expenditure of a dollar of Government money. It perhaps means the conservation of very great resources in the way of production of precious metals, which would not be produced if these miners were taken away from their productive employment and put to the relatively nonproductive employment of working these assessment claims. It does not involve giving them any special benefits, because under the laws they must do the amount of work required before they can prove up or make application for proof of a mining claim which they have taken. I trust there will be no opposition to the passage of the resolution.

Gentlemen will contend that this legislation lowers the bars to prospectors and encourages them to ask permanent release from their obligations. The committee does not want to do that, and anticipating that situation have expressly provided that no one man or company shall claim exemption for more than five claims.

We ask that this relief be extended to the oil locations because it is just. It was an injustice and a mistake to compel them to do assessment work last year, and the year before. That is doubly true because no man can point to a single oil placer location in my State or the West to-day that has yet succeeded in developing a producing property on the great shale deposits in that country. [Applause.]

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chariman, I was satisfied of the merits of this resolution from the first day it was introduced, but I desired to hear from those directly engaged in all phases of the mining business. Accordingly I telegraphed, on the 17th of this month, to the secretary of the Colorado Metal Mining Association, asking whether in the judgment of his association the best interests of the mining industry and of mining communities would be served by suspending the requirement of annual assessment work during the current year.

Now, I want to say that the members of this association are all actively engaged in the mining industry and are men who under ordinary conditions have everything to lose and nothing to gain by failure to develop their mines or by failure to increase production. They are in the mining business, not the stock-selling business, and their living depends on the actual production from mines and the sale of the product at a reasonable profit.

As this association includes nearly everybody in the mining business in Colorado, of course it includes many large mine owners, but most of the members are small operators, men of very moderate means, for Colorado, notwithstanding her marvelous production of precious metals and her fabulous rich discoveries, is preeminently a State of small mines, whose ownership is scattered through every class of the community. Many mines affected by this resolution were located by very poor men who had grown old and weather-stained in tramping the hills, who had had few comforts and luxuries, and the best part of whose lives had been spent in studying the rear elevation of a pack burro.

And there are others who are young men just returned from the war, to whom we have indeed granted the privilege of suspended assessment work but with a proviso that extends it only for six months from their discharge. A great many of these have already been demobilized for many months and are without means. This resolution is primarily in the interest of the poor man.

The secretary of the Colorado Metal Mining Association, Mr. Tomblin, wired me as follows:

> Replying to yours of the 17th, many returning soldiers who are claim owners will be unable without great hardship to perform annual assessment work on mining claims this year. Labor shortage, high cost of material and supplies, together with general distressing conditions of the industry certainly warrant a suspension of assessment work again this year. Claim owners and mining men generally will appreciate your support of the pending resolution.

Supplementing what has been said by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING], I call attention to the fact that work done by returning soldiers in the latter part of the year will be done at a very great disadvantage. The soldiers have, as they should have, our very particular sympathy; but the sympathy should extend to everyone engaged in the mining industry, essential in peace and vital in war, which has suffered for the last two years as has no other industry in America. Everybody from the mining States knows that when mining operations are carried on at altitudes of 7,000 feet and more—and in Colorado there are many mines much higher than that—it means that they are carried on at enormous difficulties and at very heavy expense. Snows are very heavy, and they will commence in another six weeks, and roads and trails will become impassible and supplies unobtainable. This is so under usual conditions, but we are not asking for a suspension of the annual assessment work on this account, but on account of unusual conditions brought on by the war and aggravated by the administration. The cost of mining has enormously increased. Wages have increased about 50 per cent since 1914. At that, the miner is certainly not overpaid, now that we are dealing with what is virtually a 50-cent dollar. The mine laborer does not get what he should have, but he gets as much and more than his employer can pay, because materials, powder, lumber, machinery, food for men employed in mining—everything, in fact, which enters into the conduct of the mining industry—has increased from 100 to 200 per cent over prewar prices.

As a result both employers and employees have in many localities quit the business. Smelting charges have very greatly increased. These things are all, perhaps, the natural result of war conditions, for which nobody is to be blamed, but which should nevertheless entitle those who have suffered from them to the consideration of the greatest and richest Government in the world.

There is another element of hardship, however, for which not the war but the administration is directly responsible. This is the enormous increase of freight rates on supplies to, and on ores from, the mines, coupled with burdensome and unnecessary traffic regulations. The mining industry early in June, 1918, protested against an increase of 25 per cent in freight rates, but instead of the increase being only 25 per cent it was doubled.

Added to this were regulations rigorously applying demurrage charges, which were especially burdensome as applied to narrow-gauge cars, as there were a surplus of these cars on the narrow-gauge roads. Many of them were idle anyhow, and their prompt release from the mines added nothing whatsoever to the efficiency of the railroad service as a whole. Many of these cars had to be placed at isolated loading points and often loaded by wagons traveling over snow-blocked roads. The demurrage charge had been adjusted by the railroads under private management with a view to the reasonable requirements of the industry. Its rigorous collection by the United States Railroad Administration was a serious blow to an already overburdened industry. I am not sure that this and other regulations particularly burdensome to the mining industry have been continuously applied up to the present date, but they succeeded in putting many mines out of business while they were in effect, and I understand that some of them are still in force.

I desire to state also that the excess-profits tax, while concededly of great benefit for the raising of revenue, bears harshly upon mines which have run for years on hope and which realized the hope just in time to have it taken away by a tax which made the patient sacrifices of years the very reason for depriving those sacrifices of their fruits.

There are other straws which broke the back of the mining industry in the Rocky Mountain States. I might say there was a whole straw stack of them.

Mr. Chairman, our mountains look to-day to Congress out of thousands of lifeless eyes, the tunnels and shafts of deserted mines—eyes which were once the "windows of the soul" of a happy, useful, and prosperous industry. They look to the Government for relief from conditions for which the administration is at least partly responsible.

Many men have worked for years and gone deeply in debt to "make their stake" in mining only to see it wiped out as soon as made by war conditions and Government exactions. Many other men have located mines in good faith and performed their annual assessment for three or four years, and if they are not now relieved by this resolution, will find that their labor enures only to the benefit of other men who have made no sacrifice and incurred no risk, but who, through the advantages of ready cash, are able to relocate their property and perform the assessment work.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, let me suggest that the annual assessment is not a payment to the Government. It is a wise provision of the law to compel development, to encourage industry, and to promote production. But the requirement of the annual assessment work for this year will not compel development. It will compel only waste—economic waste—by requiring money to be spent where it can do the least good, where, at present costs, it will buy the very least of progress. It will not encourage industry. It will take men away from productive and useful employment, compelling them, in order to save what they have, to engage in nonproductive and almost useless employment; it will not bring any mining prospect appreciably nearer the stage of profitable production. In short, the requirement of the annual assessment work in mines during the year 1919 is an economic waste and an industrial wrong. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

By unanimous consent Mr. VAILE was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the provisions of this resolution, and I opposed it when the legislation was under consideration in 1917 in the last Congress. Certainly the reasons that impelled the Congress to enact this resolution, which is to relieve miners who have entered claims and agreed to do a certain amount of work from their obligations, ought not now to be considered in extending the time now that peace has come. The truth of the matter is that there are a lot of men who have got claims out in this western country who are compelled to do a certain amount of work, but who find that they can make more money somewhere else, and they get these jobs somewhere else, and they know that if they want to keep the claim they have to go back there and do $100 worth of work, and this is a proposition to relieve them. They say there is a stringency in the labor market. We have been told by high authority that in the Western States there are thousands of men, many of whom are returned soldiers, wandering around there looking for employment. We have even had tabulated statements from the Department of Labor, which wanted to get a $2,000,000 appropriation to take care of these men who have come back here. While there may have been reasons to relieve them from this requirement when they were fighting, when they were in the military forces, I say that the time now has come to require them to keep their agreement and the understanding that was had when they filed those claims, that they should go back there and proceed to work them; and if not, they should abandon their claims and let other men who may be waiting enter upon the claims and do the amount of work that is necessary. The question of whether gold is high or low or plentiful has nothing to do with it. It is a part of the law of the land that these people who file claims out there should do a certain amount of work each year, and this is letting down the bars and is furnishing a basis for coming in here and making permanent legislation of this character relieving them from all requirements that they should do the work. Heretofore we have provided that it should not apply to oil placer locations or claims. That proviso is stricken out here, and now we find that after the war is over, when the men are no longer in the military or the naval service, when while during the war oil placer locations were not entitled to benefits of legislation such as this, that now that the war is over they are going to be given the benefits of having this restriction lifted. I am opposed to passing this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provision of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States which requires on each mining claim located, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor to be performed or improvements aggregating such amount to be made during each year, be, and the same is hereby, suspended during the calendar year 1919: Provided, That every claimant of any such mining claim in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution shall file or cause to be filed in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded, on or before December 31, 1919, a notice of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution: Provided further, That this resolution shall not apply to oil placer locations or claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the figures "1919," insert "Provided, That no such suspension shall be granted to any one claimant for more than five claims."

Mr. RAKER rose.

Mr. WALSH. Well, the gentleman has to make some motion.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; there is a committee amendment pending.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman wants to talk to the amendment?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I have a perfecting amendment.

Mr. RAKER. To this one?

Mr. WALSH. I desire to offer a perfecting amendment if the gentleman has no motion to offer.

Mr. RAKER. Then, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WINGO. But the gentleman does not have to do that. The committee amendment has been reported by the Clerk, and the gentleman has a right to speak against the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH. He has not stated for what purpose he takes the floor.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; he has. The presumption is that it is either for or against the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman takes the floor, he should state the purpose for which he takes the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not stated his purpose.

Mr. RAKER. I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the proviso, so it may be clear, provided that no such suspension shall be granted to any one claimant for more than five claims. This is new. It is not in the suspension for 1917 and 1918. I think it is well to state here that the committee may know that on all filings made this year no assessment work will have to be done, but the man has all of 1920 to do his assessment work. Only those claims that are valid or held to be valid on the 31st of December, 1918, will be affected by this legislation, and they will have to do the assessment work for this year 1919 on all valid claims existing on the date named. Now, of course, the larger percentage of the claims are individual, individual miners and prospectors, the men who have developed the West, who have gone out into this new country, who have gone through all the hardships it is possible for a man to go through in prospecting for minerals; they have been the ones who have discovered these valuable minerals. Aid should be given those people that the claim might be worked and might be properly developed. There has been large development of placer mining and hydraulic mining. Expensive mills have been placed upon the property in many instances. Now, there are a number—two or three in my district that I know of personally—that have a number of claims; in some instances more than five claims. They should all be protected and given the benefit of the provision of this resolution. The Mammoth Copper Co. in northern California have obtained their claims in a legitimate way and have paid a good price for them to the prospector, who receives the benefit. They have large works upon those claims. They have been compelled to shut down in the last two months on account of men, on account of material, and upon the question of the reduction in price. Now, there is no need, there will be no need, to require those men this year to do that $100 work of assessment on their claims, even if they do hold more than five claims. The Government is amply protected, and next year those men who maintained their claims will have to do the $100 work of assessment. And I want to say to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that we have never failed, nor do I believe we ever will fail, to do away with the actual assessment work on these mining claims that have been in operation since 1872 and which has worked well and is a beneficial law. It says when a man does assessment work on an honest claim it gives an opportunity of properly developing the mine to men of small means who go out and discover that which no man knew of before and to place a new article upon the market of value to this country. I want to see the legitimate prospector protected. He is the man who has made good. He has done much for his country. He risks his all. Give him a chance. The same can be said for the man or men who expend their money in developing these mining claims by actually working them. It is a very large risk at best.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the committee amendment, line 10, by striking out the word "five" and inserting the word "three."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 1, line 10, strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to restrict this as much as possible, and it seems to be the disposition of the committee to pass this resolution. I do not think there ought to be any individuals or combination of individuals, and I understand there may be, who own a large number of claims out in that western country who ought to be relieved from all work upon their claims, and I think it is reasonable to insist that if they have more than three claims that they must do some work upon some of them, and I provide that they shall be relieved from work upon three of them. That is the purpose of offering the amendment.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for a moment in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, has my five minutes expired?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not; the gentleman had yielded the floor.

Mr. WALSH. I just turned around to return to my place.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman had not yielded the floor, his time had not expired.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, Mr. Chairman, whether we make it five or three it would not very seriously affect the Anaconda Copper Co. or any of those large corporations that own mines or which have control of mines by their being held by individuals, and to say that if a man has five claims in a certain region that he can go off and hold them in suspension for three successive years—that is what it will be now—and do no work upon them, it seems to me to be hardly advisable. Now, if the man may have one or two or perhaps three claims, I submit that three would be a more proper number than five. That was the purpose of offering the amendment, not to cover too much territory in letting down these bars in this way for the third successive time. Now, the gentleman from California makes always the same argument on this measure, and that is that next year they will do their work. That is what he told us the last time we passed the bill. That is what he tells us now, that if we pass it this time, next year they will go back and do the work. I think the gentleman from California will be here in the year 1920 indorsing legislation similar to this and making the same argument that if we pass this now in 1921 they will have to do the work.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, referring to the prophecy just made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] as to what would be asked hereafter by the mining interests of the West, I do not believe anybody from the mining regions of this country will come here asking for permanent release from the necessity of assessment work. The law has stood the test of over 30 years, and the mining people of the West approve of it. The committee offered the amendment that is now before the House for the very purpose of seeing to it that only those who had a limited number of claims and were most entitled to relief should be protected under this law. The gentleman from California refers to the fact that the Mammoth Copper Co. has more than five claims. The Mammoth Copper Co. sounds big enough to me to have enough money to do its assessment work if they have more than five claims, and that is true also of the Utah Copper Co., or any other holders of a large number of claims.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELLING. I will.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. What is the size of a mining claim?

Mr. HAWLEY. Six hundred by one thousand five hundred feet.

Mr. MAYS. The size of a mining claim is 600 by 1,500 feet, or 20.4 acres, and five claims would be five times 20, or 100 acres.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. What amount of work has to be done in order to entitle one to a patent?

Mr. WELLING. One hundred dollars' worth of work each year for five years.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. So with $500 worth of work they can get a patent without regard to their doing more work or not?

Mr. WELLING. Of course, there must be a valid discovery.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mineral in place. If they have not mineral in place they can not get it?

Mr. WELLING. They can not get it unless they have done $100 worth of work each year for five years, or they may have done $500 worth of work during any lesser period of time. They must also comply with the law providing for surveys, discovery, and so forth.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. So all that the Mammoth Copper Co., which has done a lot of work, has to do is to get its patent?

Mr. WELLING. If they have not done their assessment work and own more than five claims, under this resolution they have got to do the work and ought to do the work, but I think it ought to be limited as the committee has limited it, after careful investigation, to five claims, rather than to cut it down to three claims, as proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I do not live in the West. I come from Kentucky, and have no personal interest in any mining claims. This proposition is brought to us by the Members from the Western States. It does not take from the Federal Government a cent. It does not involve the Government at all. If any person is injured by this action it is the people of the Western States themselves, and the Members from the Western States come to us and say that this ought to be done. We had four days of very extensive hearings on this bill. No opposition developed from any source. Everybody agreed that it was a good thing and a thing that ought to be done.

Now, we did limit the benefits of this bill to persons holding as many as five claims. This bill helps the locator, the miner in the Western States, and is limited to five claims, so that you do not help to protect the big grabber of a great number of claims. The locator and the common miner out in the Western States, because of the conditions of the country during the war, had to leave his section and go to Spokane, and other places, and do war work. Now, that disorganization brought on such a condition that unless you give these locators this relief—and many of them have given, perhaps, two, three, and four years' work on their claims—they will lose the two or three or four years of work that they have already done on their claims.

As I have said, it does not hurt the Government. It does not hurt the country. It does not hurt the development of the West, but it permits that labor to go into active developments that are already made in that country and, on the whole, will help the country. The western Members who are affected say it is a good thing, and say we ought to pass it. And my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is like myself, in that he does not know about this. If he did, I am sure he would not make this opposition to it.

I thank you. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the committee, and there is just one thing I wanted to ask.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that this amendment was put in in the interest of the laboring man, the miner who works with his hands out there, and not in the interest of, as they call him, the big "claim hog"?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Exactly. It is to help these poor men, the locators, who were obliged to go into other industries during the war.

Mr. VAILE. Is it not a fact that there are thousands of poor men who have as many as four or five claims all through the West?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The hearings show that these poor, small locators are distributed throughout the Western States, and this bill is one that helps that class of people and not the big fellow.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "resolution" strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachussets rise?

Mr. WALSH. I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

I desire to ask the chairman of the committee the reason the committee for the first time permits this legislation to apply to oil-placer locations?

Mr. GARLAND. I can answer that question by saying that when the other bill, the first bill, extending the time for making the assessment work, in 1917 and 1918, came into this House it contained exactly this provision. So it is not the first time that the committee reported it in that way. Now, a great many shale-oil placer claims have been made up in Colorado. Oil claims are practically operated under this same rule. Assessment work must be done and proven, and so forth. For that reason the claim is made that labor is scarce there, and just as much loss will occur to the claimant in that case if you do not give the relief this year as would occur in any other place.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Mines and Mining Committee, of which I was a member for many years, has never been in favor of making any discrimination in annual assessment work between oil placer claims and any other kind of placer or lode claims, and there is no reason now why one should be exempt and another not. The last time this bill was passed by the House, in 1917, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] inadvertently, I think, made the motion on the floor of the House to amend the bill to exempt oil placer claims from the suspension, and his amendment was adopted, and so the oil placer claims have been required to do the annual work during the past two years that all others have been relieved from.

Mr. WALSH. There was not anything inadvertent about it. He made a strong speech in support of his motion to strike it out.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I say "inadvertently," because immediately afterwards he introduced a bill himself to exempt the oil placer claims from assessment work, and he tried industriously to pass it, but failed to do so. The oil placer claimants throughout the West have ever since felt that Congress acted unjustly and without any warrant whatever in discriminating against them that way; so that the committee in this bill is treating all mining claims alike, both placer and lode, and putting them all on the same basis. I have received many protests against this bill and many urgent requests for its passage, and every reason given for its passage applies as much to oil placers as it does to any other placers or to lode claims. The scarcity of labor applies as much in one case as in the other. And the high cost of everything enters into all of them alike. I hope the committee amendment will be adopted, and that the House will extend the same relief to all placer and lode claimants. Congress must pass this bill for the returning soldiers, and all mining claimants will be relieved if the bill is made general for this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That this resolution shall not be construed to alter, modify, amend, or repeal the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service," approved July 17, 1917.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration House joint resolution 150, to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1919, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. At what stage will the amendment to the title be in order?

The SPEAKER. After the joint resolution is passed.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the House joint resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Mines and Mining. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded. Those in favor of the motion to recommit will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One gentleman has risen. Those opposed to the motion to recommit will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and three gentleman have risen.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is an amendment to the title offered? Without objection, the title will be amended to conform to the text of the bill.

Mr. WINGO. I suspect the amendment proposed to the title will hardly be cured by the suggestion of the Chair. There is a committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on certain mining claims during the year 1919."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the House joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker——

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 221.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order for the House to consider under the general rules of the House H. R. 7478, a bill "To amend section 5200 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules, making in order a bill upon which I think the committee report was unanimous from the Committee on Banking and Currency. Is there any desire for debate on the rule?

Mr. POU. There is no desire on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BLANTON. I have a privileged resolution which I desire to submit.

Mr. PLATT rose.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is privileged. This resolution makes it in order to consider the bill referred to. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT]. Is this bill on the Union Calendar?

Mr. PLATT. It is on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] calls up House bill 7478 on the House Calendar, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5200 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, be further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed 10 per cent of the amount of the capital stock of such association, actually paid in and unimpaired, and 10 per cent of its unimpaired surplus fund: Provided, however, That (1) the discount of bills of exchange drawn against actually existing values, (2) the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same, (3) the discount of bills or notes secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, or other such documents conveying or securing title covering readily marketable nonperishable staples, including live stock, when the actual market value of the property securing the obligation is not at any time less than 110 per cent of the face amount of the bills or notes secured by such documents and when property is fully covered by insurance, and (4) the discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds of the United States issued since April 24, 1917, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, shall not be considered as money borrowed within the meaning of this section. The total liabilities to any association, of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm upon any note or notes purchased or discounted by such association and secured by bonds or certificates of indebtedness as described in (4) hereof shall not exceed (except to the extent permitted by rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury) 10 per cent of such capital stock and surplus fund of such association and the total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm upon bills and notes secured in the manner described and authorized under (3) hereof shall not at any time exceed 15 per cent of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus. The exception made under (3) hereof shall not apply to the bills or notes of any one person, company, corporation, or firm for more than six months in any consecutive 12 months.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "values," insert "including drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents conveying or securing title to goods shipped, and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment, and also including bankers' acceptances of the kinds described in section 13 of the Federal reserve act."

Page 2, line 13, after the word "of," strike out "bills or."

Page 19, after the word "the," strike out "bills or."

Page 3, line 10, after the word "firm," strike out the words "upon bills and notes secured in the manner described and authorized under (3) hereof shall not at any time exceed 15 per cent of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus. The exception made under (3) hereof shall not apply to the bills or notes of any one person, company, corporation, or firm for more than six months in any consecutive 12 months," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "for money borrowed, including the liabilities upon notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof, shall not at any time exceed 25 per cent of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus. The exception made under (3) hereof shall not apply to the notes of any one person, company, corporation, or firm for more than six months in any consecutive 12 months."

"SEC. 2. That section 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 20, Title I, of the act approved April 5, 1918, be further amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 5202. No national banking association shall at any time be indebted, or in any way liable, to an amount exceeding the amount of its capital stock at such time actually paid in and remaining undiminished by losses or otherwise, except on account of demands of the nature following:

"'First. Notes of circulation.

"'Second. Moneys deposited with or collected by the association.

"'Third. Bills of exchange or drafts drawn against money actually on deposit to the credit of the association, or due thereto.

"'Fourth. Liabilities to the stockholders of the association for dividends and reserve profits.

"'Fifth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of the Federal reserve act.

"'Sixth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of the War Finance Corporation act.

"'Seventh. Liabilities created by the indorsement of accepted bills of exchange payable abroad actually owned by the indorsing bank and discounted at home or abroad.'"

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend the national banking act in the provision known as section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that no national bank shall loan to one person, firm, or corporation an amount that is more than 10 per cent of its capital stock and surplus.

The act has been amended a number of times by making necessary exceptions, and it never has been literally enforced with regard to all classes of bank paper. For instance, the discount of "commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same" has long been an exception. And more recently, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, an exception was made of notes based upon Liberty-bond collateral and United States Treasury certificates; so that the banks can loan to any one person practically an unlimited amount under regulations made by the Comptroller of the Currency on that kind of collateral. The discount of bills of exchange drawn against "actually existing values" has for many years been one of the exceptions stated in the law, but recently the Comptroller of the Currency has made certain rulings which have narrowed the application of the statute so that a good many banks have been prevented, or have thought themselves prevented, from doing business which they have always done and which has generally been regarded as safe. For instance, the words "actually existing values" have been so interpreted as to shut out sight drafts, on which cotton and wheat have been financed largely in the primary markets, so that the banks were held down practically to a 10 per cent limit. Now it is obvious that when thousands of bales of cotton are being handled, or thousands of bushels of wheat, if drafts are drawn on a small bank of $100,000 or less capital, and that bank is held down to only 10 per cent of capital and surplus to one person, firm, or corporation, it can finance the marketing of only a small part of the commodities of the neighborhood, unless through a large number of buyers.

The banks have regarded these transactions as exchange transactions and not as loans, and they have been, generally speaking, I think, exchange transactions. The banks, for instance, have charged no interest, but one-tenth of 1 per cent for exchange—that is, for furnishing the cash. The transaction is generally that the farmer or grower brings in his cotton or his wheat to market and the buyer purchases it. The grower then draws a draft on the purchaser which is taken to the local bank, and the local bank furnishes the cash which is paid over to the farmer, and the purchaser accepts the draft. There must always be shipping documents attached to the draft, and if those shipping documents make certain that the goods are in transit, moving out of that territory to the larger place where the money is furnished to carry the goods farther, the transaction is perfectly safe and has been carried on for many years without any objection. There have been discovered some cases where commodities have been held possibly for speculation on sight drafts which when accepted become due, so that the drafts when so held in the banks have become, as the comptroller puts it, loans instead of drafts. That practice should be guarded against. We have guarded against it by making our amendment include drafts and bills of exchange only when "secured by shipping documents conveying or securing title to goods shipped, and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment"; so that the goods must be in transit going from the primary market on the way to final consumption.

A good deal of cotton, wheat, and other staples have been carried on warehouse receipts. The banks have carried these commodities on warehouse receipts above the 10 per cent limit on time drafts or obligations of that kind, and that is a perfectly sound transaction if properly limited. In order to make sure that that shall not be discriminated against we have put in a third exception, which provides that "the discount of notes secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, or other such documents conveying or securing title covering readily marketable nonperishable staples, including live stock," shall not be counted as money borrowed within the meaning of the 10 per cent limit, but we have put a new limit on this class of loans to one person, firm, or corporation of 25 per cent of capital and surplus of the banks making the loan.

This is a new provision, while the amendment above, referring to drafts and bills of exchange, is rather a definition of language long in the law—a partial definition of the words "actually existing values."

On this class of loans, where the commodity is carried for a certain length of time, we require a margin. The collateral must be 110 per cent of the face amount of the notes, and these loans to one person, firm, or corporation are not to extend more than 6 months in any one period of 12 months—a necessary limitation to prevent tying up the funds of a bank in speculation.

Then, we have added as a second section to the bill an amendment to section 5202, Revised Statutes, which refers to the obligations of the bank itself, not of an individual to the bank. For instance, the national banking laws have long prescribed that no national banking association shall at any time be indebted to an amount exceeding its capital stock. But, of course, certain obligations had to be made exceptions. For instance, notes in circulation, which are an obligation of the bank; moneys deposited with or collected by the association. As everybody knows, many banks having a capital, we will say, of $100,000 have deposits of $1,000,000 or more. A deposit is a liability and that means that the bank is liable right there for ten times its capital.

Mr. JONES of Texas. According to the gentleman's judgment, will this provision for commodities in actual process of shipment include products on board the cars preparatory to shipment, where they have simply been loaded on the cars and yet the shipment has not started?

Mr. PLATT. Provided the shipping documents are attached to the draft, it will unquestionably include them.

I was speaking when interrupted of the second section of the bill, with regard to liabilities of the bank itself, and saying that deposits were one exception to the limitations. Then bills of exchange drawn against money actually on deposit to the credit of the bank are a third exception.

A fourth exception consists of liabilities to stockholders of the association or bank for dividends and reserve profits.

A fifth exception is liabilities incurred under the provisions of the Federal reserve act. Obviously the whole success of the Federal reserve act depends on that. The rediscounting of notes with Federal reserve banks creates a contingent liability of the banks rediscounting. They have to indorse them, so that this class of liabilities had to be made an exception.

A sixth exception, similar to the last, was put in by the War Finance Corporation act in 1918, making an exception of obligations incurred under that act.

Seventh—and this is all there is new in this section—an exception is now made of "liabilities created by the indorsement of accepted bills of exchange payable abroad actually owned by the indorsing bank and discounted at home or abroad."

The committee's report gives very full information on this. There is no limit on the number of bills of exchange, payable abroad, a bank may purchase, and no reason why it should not rediscount or sell the bills of exchange, but in order to rediscount or sell them the bank must indorse them and incur a contingent liability. The provision is very necessary if our banks are to serve their purpose in financing our foreign trade. And I may say right here that foreign banks as a rule are not hedged about by these numerous limitations that apply to our banks.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. What was the committee's reason for striking out the words "bills or," page 2, line 13, and again in line 19?

Mr. PLATT. The committee's reason for striking that out and leaving in the word "notes" was so that the exception would not seem to support any ruling that these were not always proper under suitable restrictions.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I wish the gentleman would explain that a little further.

Mr. PLATT. In the theory of most bankers the ruling of the comptroller has narrowed the law and ruled out practices long in existence, and which, if properly limited, are generally regarded absolutely safe and legitimate. We amplified exception 1 by mentioning bills of exchange, and so forth, and in exception 3 we mentioned "notes" by way of contrast. I do not think the amendment of great importance, but there is an obvious difference in the transactions.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The italicized words in section 1 would cover what was originally intended in section 3.

Mr. PLATT. That is the idea. The striking out of "bills" in exception 3 is not particularly important, because a bill and a note may be said to be the same thing; but they are not always the same thing.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. In line 20, page 2, it says "when such property is fully covered by insurance." In actual practice these commodities are not usually covered by insurance, are they?

Mr. PLATT. They should be, surely, to make the banks safe in the case of commodities covered by warehouse receipts, to which this exception particularly applies.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. If they are where they are covered by warehouse receipts; but I am speaking of the commodities in transportation.

Mr. PLATT. If the commodity should be live stock, you should have the insurance required.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Would not the liability of the carrier protect it, and would it not be inconvenient to get the insurance policy to deposit with the draft?

Mr. PLATT. While in transit the carrier is responsible, and that might be held to be insurance.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. This provides that they shall be insured.

Mr. PLATT. That means and applies more to commodities in the warehouse than in shipment. Exception 3 is meant to cover that particular matter.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I wish the gentleman would explain briefly to what class of loans the 25 per cent limit applies, and in that connection he might state whether the 10 per cent is limited to any class of loans.

Mr. PLATT. The 10 per cent applies, for instance, if you go to a bank with your personal note and want to borrow money, even if you have got collateral; you can use railroad bonds or any perfectly good collateral. You can borrow an unlimited amount on Liberty bonds, but on any other collateral you can not borrow more than 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of the bank. The bank examiners include in the 10 per cent contingent liability like the indorsement of other paper. Now, under our amendment you can borrow up to 25 per cent if your collateral is in staple commodities evidenced by shipping documents or warehouse receipts.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says "capital and surplus"; why not amend by putting in undivided profits?

Mr. PLATT. We do not want to cut the law wide open. "Capital and surplus" has been the law for many years. I think the undivided profits are counted as surplus now under the form of bank statements now used by the comptroller.

Banking practices differ in different places, but Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, tells me that in some of the larger cities the cotton buyer will go into the bank and deposit $10,000 and ask for a credit of $200,000. He can be given the credit on the books of the bank for $200,000 under this amendment if the bank has capital and surplus of $800,000. He has then to his credit $210,000. In the course of a week he draws a check for $100,000, and that is subtracted from his account. In the course of the next week he draws a check for $50,000, and that is subtracted from his account. According to the arrangement they make he pays interest only on what he takes out and for the time for which he takes it out. It is practically a letter of credit. Every time he draws his check he must bring to the bank shipping documents or warehouse receipts to secure his loan.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Who fixes the value, the bank itself?

Mr. PLATT. The loans are only made on goods actually sold, and the value is in the selling price of the goods.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. What would you do in a case where they would have some fictitious value of sale?

Mr. PLATT. In the first place the draft must be drawn in good faith, and the banker is supposed to know enough to protect himself against any fictitious sale. This bill applies only to "nonperishable readily marketable staples." The market value of such staples is quoted from day to day and is known presumably not only to the bankers in the neighborhood, but to every business man.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. What I am trying to get at is this: In case a banker did make this deal, and it turned out to be bad, would he be criminally liable under this bill if he acted in good faith?

Mr. PLATT. There are penalties prescribed in other sections, but not in this particular section of the national banking act.

Are there any further questions in regard to the bill? Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire some time?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know the intention of the gentleman from New York. I am not anxious to get very much time, but one Member on this side wants considerable time, and if we could have an hour on this side we could use it very well. The gentleman can reserve his time so as to move the previous question.

Mr. PLATT. This bill is on the House Calendar, and I have only one hour.

Mr. PHELAN. If you will move the previous question, then whoever is recognized will have the hour.

Mr. PLATT. I do not intend to yield time except for debate.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not intend to, either. I do not know what else is pending, and I do not want to take up too much time, but one Member here wants to use considerable time, and I would like to give it to him, if possible.

Mr. CANNON. To talk about the bill?

Mr. PHELAN. Why not give us an hour on this side?

Mr. MANN. Debate upon any other subject would not be in order on this bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that I want the time. I was denied time in committee. The bill was reported while I was on the floor of the House answering a roll call. I want time to discuss the bill and the conditions that have arisen and that have put some people out of the market by reason of that. I want to discuss the bill, and I do not want to talk about anything else.

Mr. PLATT. I am not willing to yield the floor, and I have agreed not to take more than an hour on the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman can reserve his time.

Mr. MANN. If he yields the floor, he yields the floor, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. CANNON. There are a lot of other important bills to follow this.

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman can keep control so as to move the previous question within the hour, unless the Chair recognizes some one else. If the Chair recognizes me, I will yield time only for the purpose of debate, and agree with the gentleman from New York that the previous question may be moved.

Mr. WINGO. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's desire to confine debate to the bill.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WINGO. I really want an hour to discuss the different amendments. This is a very intricate proposition.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, it is not an intricate proposition.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not think so, but it is intricate and difficult to people who are cotton and wheat growers, and who are exporters on the coast.

Mr. PLATT. I think the gentleman can easily express all his ideas in 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has the power to yield time in his hour and reserve enough time to move the previous question.

Mr. PLATT. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] for debate.

Mr. PHELAN. If we could have half an hour for the gentleman from Arkansas, that would answer.

Mr. PLATT. There are a number of other bills coming up, and I agreed not to take more than an hour on this bill when the rule was made.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield me half an hour?

Mr. PLATT. I yield one-half hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] for debate only, and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

[Mr. WINGO addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Have I used just 15 minutes?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I wish I had more time, because there are some other points that I would like to discuss in the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire me to use some more time now?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, for a great many years section 5200 of the Revised Statutes has provided that no firm, person, or corporation shall be allowed to borrow from any national bank in excess of 10 per cent of the unimpaired capital and surplus of that bank. However, for the last 35 or 40 years it has been the custom of the bankers throughout the United States, so far as we have information, without exception, to treat bills of exchange drawn against actually existing values, which enables the shipment of commodities to market and of manufactured goods to market, the shipment of live stock to market and raw materials to market, as not being a loan, and therefore that the amount temporarily withdrawn on such bills of exchange shall not be charged against that 10 per cent which the law allows that same individual to borrow out of that bank.

Recently, however, the Comptroller of the Currency has, in a strict construction of section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, held, in effect, that such bills of exchange, although drawn against actually existing values and accompanied by documents evidencing title to goods shipped, ought to be charged against the 10 per cent that such person is allowed to borrow on his own paper of the unimpaired capital and surplus of a national bank.

That will have the effect in the wheat country of the Northwest and of the corn country of the Central West and of the North, and it will have the effect in the cotton country of the South, and a little later it will have the effect in the manufacturing sections of the North and East, practically to tie up to the extent, perhaps, of three-fourths of the banking facilities which heretofore, before that ruling, have been used to market goods, wares, and merchandise and to get raw materials moved to market.

To cure that situation the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, in response to the cry of the bankers that they could not sufficiently help the farmers to move their commodities to market without an amendment to section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, have arranged four amendments to section 5200 of the Revised Statutes and embodied them in this bill.

Now, I want to give you a practical example, and I think that is one good way to illustrate such a proposition. I live in the city of Houston, Tex. It has $100,000,000 of banking resources, first and last, capital, surplus, undivided profits, and deposits. If only 10 per cent of that amount of money can be loaned to the cotton factors and cotton buyers, we would move only the one forty-fifth part of that portion of the cotton crop raised in Texas which is moved to the city of Houston and through the city of Houston sent on its way up to the manufacturing centers of the East or sent on its way across the ocean. Therefore, in the years heretofore, the bankers of Houston have, in pursuance of tacit permission granted by the comptroller's department, not limited themselves to 10 per cent of the capital and surplus which they may loan to a factor to buy cotton with, but after they have loaned him that 10 per cent of capital and surplus out of any bank they have nevertheless been at liberty——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. EAGLE. I thank the gentleman. They nevertheless have been at perfect liberty to discount drafts and bills of exchange drawn from the interior on the cotton factor in Houston and by him accepted and taken to that bank and sold and carried by the bank for a period of time until the cotton could come to Houston and be transshipped to Europe and bring back the gold, which automatically retires that temporary use of money. The ruling of the comptroller is that such bills of exchange, drawn against such actually existing values in process of marketing, is a loan, a demand loan, and as such could not be extended under this section 5200 of the Revised Statutes.

To change that, so as to allow this banking facility to be extended for the movement of these commodities, we have made four provisions as exceptions to section 5200 of the Revised Statutes. One exception is that there shall not be charged against the 10 per cent that a man may borrow out of a bank—10 per cent of its capital and surplus—such a thing as his acceptance of a bill of exchange, drawn from the interior upon him and by him accepted and sold to the bank, if it be for a commodity shipped, with only one condition—that the bank can not then hold such piece of paper longer than six months. That will prevent speculation.

The same thing exactly would fit the farmers of Minnesota and of the Dakotas and all the other great wheat sections of the country. To illustrate, you may go into a town where there is a $50,000 national bank, with $50,000 of surplus and undivided profits, and a wheat factor resident there in that town can borrow $10,000 only. Suppose, however, he is in process of helping the farmers to move $500,000 of their crop, and has made his arrangements with bankers and with his principal backers in the large city of Milwaukee or Chicago or somewhere else. The provision of this bill is such that, instead of allowing him to borrow only 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of that national bank, making a total of $10,000, to move that crop with, he may borrow the $10,000 and in addition to that he may accept bills of exchange drawn on him for so many additional bushels of wheat as he wants to buy at the market; he may accept that, and then take it to the bank, and the bank is at liberty to take that paper and give him the money to pay the farmer and let him ship his wheat and get back the gold.

Mr. PHELAN. I will take that one minute.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill. I am not going to offer an amendment, but in order to keep the record straight I desire to say that I think the bill would be very much better if we cut out of lines 7, 8, and 9, page 2, the words "and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment."

I shall not offer an amendment, because the matter was fully discussed in the committee, and the time is too limited to permit effective discussion, but I wish to say this for the sake of the record.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is unnecessary to go very largely into this matter. It is merely an enactment affirmatively preventing the effect of a rule which was salutary in the instances which it was made to cover, but which is frequently improperly applied by bank examiners. For instance, a sight draft would be made against actually existing values, to wit, cotton. The bank receives the sight draft, the drawee accepts it, the bank discounts it, and pays the farmer for his cotton or his wheat, and the drawee leaves it in the bank as a loan indefinitely and does not take it up and pay it. The comptroller held that under those circumstances it was converted, by being held there an unreasonable time, converted by operation of law into a note, and, therefore, was subject to the 10 per cent limit. Now, in this amendment in exception 1 we provide that that can not be done as long as the property is in process of shipment, and the shipping documents and the draft are tied together. That is all we have attempted to do in that. In other words, a sight draft or a demand draft presented and accepted and held until the arrival of the goods at destination before the draft is paid, which is frequently the case, shall not be converted by lapse of a reasonable time, as the comptroller and his attorney have ruled, shall not be converted into a loan and thereby come within the 10 per cent limit simply because it is held more than a reasonable time for the goods to arrive, which is an uncertain quantity and always a question for the jury, and which has left the banks up in the air. This amendment provides that when the shipping documents and the draft are attached together, it shall not be considered a loan. That gets around that. Why are they held together? Take the case of the wholesale concern in the city of Columbia, S. C., dealing in flour. They order 20 carloads of flour from St. Louis sent to different customers of theirs all through the State of South Carolina.

The St. Louis merchant attaches a draft to the bills of lading for the value of the flour against the distributing company in Columbia. It reaches there, and they accept it. The St. Louis merchant gets his money. The flour is probably two weeks in getting to the customer, and the draft is not paid until the flour arrives. That is the custom. Now, under the ruling of the comptroller, if two weeks or three weeks or four weeks are more than a reasonable time—and that must be determined by the circumstances of each case, and therefore is utterly indefinite—that becomes a loan subject to the 10 per cent limit, and if the merchant in St. Louis who has discounted his draft there, with that and with his other numerous transactions, goes over the 10 per cent limit his paper is thrown out. This provides that it shall not become a loan as long as the commerce is in the course of shipment, and the draft and bill of lading are tied together. That is all it does. It protects the whole business in that way.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] stated awhile ago that it was stated to the committee that the counsel for the comptroller held that this amendment would protect the case where cotton was in motion and got to the compress and the bill of lading was surrendered for the compress receipt, and then when it came out the bill of lading was put back, and the compress receipt surrendered. He states that that is a mistake. I do not know who has made the mistake, but the attorney for the Comptroller of the Currency stated to me that that was merely one step in the shipment, and that it was covered by this and would not be held to be converted into a promissory note and come within the 10 per cent limit. But in order that that might not possibly be done a further section has been added in the very words that the gentleman from Massachusetts said ought to be stricken out, which are—

Including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment.

The cotton in process of shipment comes to the compress, the bill of lading is surrendered and the compress receipt is put in place of it. It goes through the compress, comes out at the other end; the compress receipt is then surrendered, the bill of lading is reattached, and that is merely one step in the process of shipment. The amendment including demand obligations secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment covers that very question.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Does the cotton lose its individuality by going through the compress?

Mr. STEVENSON. Oh, no; cotton does not lose its individuality when it goes into the compress, because no two bales of cotton are of the same grade.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It is not mixed up and does not become confused with other cotton or take the place of other cotton?

Mr. STEVENSON. Oh, no; the bales are numbered and are so different in grade that one bale of cotton may be worth $25 or $50 more than another. Therefore the cotton is absolutely segregated. This is a mere step in the transportation and is covered absolutely, and it is a matter of very great importance to the shippers of this country that that particular feature be adopted, because it will untie the hands of the banks, and it will take out of the twilight zone cotton covered by a draft with bill of lading attached, which can be held. The draft with bill of lading attached can not be converted into a loan, either demand or past due, and it will continue to be a draft or bill of exchange against actually existing value as long as those two documents are tied together. When the shipment is terminated then the goods are there, and the responsibility of the drawee still exists, the responsibility of the drawer still exists, and the bank is amply protected. This is a matter of very great importance to the cotton people, to the automobile people, to the flour people, to the wheat people, and to all people whose goods are shipped in that way, including the live-stock people.

They are all protected, and that is necessary in order that the wheels of commerce be not impeded by the continuance of an impossible rule under which a bank never knows whether its paper is subject to the 10 per cent limit or not, because it does not know what a jury might find was a reasonable time for the goods to be in process of shipment.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. BAER. Does the 10 per cent applying to bills of lading, receipts, and so forth, meet a situation where the farmer wants to borrow money to do harvest work but has not marketed his grain?

Mr. STEVENSON. The 10 per cent limit is that the farmer can not borrow more than 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus of the bank.

Mr. BAER. We have a law in North Dakota that would take care of that anyway; but in other States they can not take care of a farmer in the harvesting of his crops.

Mr. PHELAN. This law has been on the statute books for many years. This applies to the amount that any one man can borrow from the bank as an individual, an amount equal to 10 per cent only of the capital stock and surplus.

Mr. STEVENSON. Very few farmers, I think, would want more than 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus of the bank. If the capital was $50,000, an individual could borrow $5,000, which would probably be sufficient. Therefore they have never been hurt by that. But when it comes to putting a product on the market, that is a different proposition.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to ask the gentleman relative to the provision relating to live stock. Could a ranchman borrow 25 per cent of the capital stock and surplus on his cattle?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; while they were in transit.

Mr. HUDSPETH. But he could not borrow on them on the range?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I think this subject has been fully covered, and I do not care to take the time of the House further, except to say that while the debate has had much to say about cotton, because that is a commodity which soon will come on the market, letters that have come to me personally have been largely from Western and Northwestern States, even from the State of Michigan. It is a matter which is really immediately pressing. I desire to offer one amendment as a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PLATT: Page 2, line 4, after the word "drawn," at the end of the line, insert the words "in good faith."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the words "in good faith" have been in the statute for years, but in some way or other they were left out in the print.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. BRIGGS. Under this exception, which includes drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents, is it the chairman's construction that the shipping documents include not only bills of lading but warehouse and compress receipts if the commodity is in actual transit?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; if in actual shipment. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman move the previous question on the bill and amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. WINGO. The bill has only been read once. Amendments are not in order until the bill has been read.

The SPEAKER. There will be a separate vote on the amendments.

Mr. WINGO. The committee amendments have not been read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that the committee amendments were reported.

Mr. WINGO. I was watching for the reading of the amendments. I will state frankly that I want to make a point of order on one of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. When that amendment is reached for a vote, the gentleman can make it.

Mr. WINGO. I state frankly that that is all I want. The Chair may not sustain it, but I want to make the point.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "drawn," at the end of the line, insert the words "in good faith."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "values," insert "including drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents conveying or securing title to goods shipped, and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment, and also including bankers' acceptances of the kinds described in section 13 of the Federal reserve act."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. The previous question having been ordered, is it not in order to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 13, after the word "of," strike out the words "bills or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, strike out the words "bills or."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to interrupt the proceedings to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] if he has not inadvertently failed to offer an amendment in respect to the 110 per cent proposition. As the language now reads it is—when the actual market value of the property securing the obligation is not at any time less than 110 per cent of the face amount of the notes.

Of course, that is a mathematical impossibility. The gentleman will remember that when Gov. Harding was on the stand I called his attention to it. There are only 100 per cent in the whole.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I think that no amendment there is necessary.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman is willing to let it go, well and good.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 22, after the word "bonds" insert the words "or notes."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 3, after the word "bonds" insert the word "notes."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 10, after the word "firm," strike out the following: "upon bills and notes secured in the manner described and authorized under (3) hereof shall not at any time exceed 15 per cent of the amount of the association's paid in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus. The exception made under (3) hereof shall not apply to the bills or notes of any one person, company, corporation, or firm for more than six months in any consecutive 12 months," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "for money borrowed, including the liabilities upon notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof, shall not at any time exceed 25 per cent of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus. The exception made under (3) hereof shall not apply to the notes of any one person, company, corporation or firm for more than six months in any consecutive 12 months."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4 insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That section 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 20, Title I, of the act approved April 5, 1918, be further amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 5202. No national banking association shall at any time be indebted, or in any way liable, to an amount exceeding the amount of its capital stock at such time actually paid in and remaining undiminished by losses or otherwise, except on account of demands of the nature following:

"'First. Notes of circulation.

"'Second. Moneys deposited with or collected by the association.

"'Third. Bills of exchange or drafts drawn against money actually on deposit to the credit of the association or due thereto.

"'Fourth. Liabilities to the stockholders of the association for dividends and reserve profits.

"'Fifth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of the Federal reserve act.

"'Sixth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of the war finance corporation act.

"'Seventh. Liabilities created by the indorsement of accepted bills of exchange payable abroad actually owned by the indorsing bank and discounted at home or abroad.'"

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the point of order comes too late. The bill has been discussed and the amendments have been discussed for an hour. The previous question has been ordered on the bill and all amendments.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; and the bill is now being read at a second reading; and the only time that I can make the point of order is when the amendment is offered to the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The amendments were read, together with the bill. The gentleman should have made his point of order or reserved it at that time. No question of a point of order has been made here prior to the hour's discussion of the bill and the amendments. This amendment was discussed among the others.

Mr. WINGO. But if the previous question had not been ordered, amendments would have been discussed and offered from the floor. The gentleman himself has offered an amendment on the floor. I am raising the question at the earliest possible moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think at first blush that the time to have made the point of order was when the amendment was first reported.

Mr. WINGO. But the amendment has just been reported.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; the amendment was reported after the bill, and then the bill and all amendments were open for discussion.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I take some pride in obeying the rules of the House, and on reflection I am inclined to think that the point of order does come too late. There was so much confusion at the time that I did not think the amendments were read. On reflection I think the time when I should have made the point of order was when the amendment was first read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WINGO moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to report the bill back immediately with the following amendments:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "exchange," insert the following words: "or acceptances, time or demand."

Page 2, line 6, after the word "shipping," insert the words "or other."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, on the motion to recommit I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas to recommit the bill with instructions.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 14, noes 58.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 41, nays 249, not voting 140, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, the title was ordered to be corrected in conformity with the text.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS AND SUBCONTRACTORS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

House resolution 140.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 6323, being an act entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes."

There shall be 20 minutes general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. At the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read and considered for amendments. At the conclusion of such consideration the bill, together with amendments, shall be reported to the House, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the amendments and the bill to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the resolution makes in order the consideration of a bill that has been reported in two Congresses from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Judge Burnett, a former Member from Alabama, now deceased, and whose memory we all revere, made a very complete report upon the bill originally. That report has been embodied in the report upon the bill as it is now before the House. This resolution gives the House opportunity to consider it.

Is there any desire for debate upon the rule?

Mr. GARRETT. Not on this side. I have had no request.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6323) for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The bill was read by title.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to reimburse the losses of contractors and subcontractors for the construction of Government buildings, including material men, where the contract was entered into prior to our declaration of war on Germany. We had extensive hearings on a similar bill in the last Congress, and, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has stated, the committee unanimously reported the bill with the recommendation that it pass. We did not have extensive hearings on it at this session because the membership of the committee, which was largely the same, thoroughly understood the proposition.

There are a number of these contractors who have spent practically all the money they could raise in carrying out their contracts with the Government. This is not setting a precedent but merely following a number of precedents which have already been established by Congress. I recall that a number of years ago Congress reimbursed the contractors for the erection of the public building at San Francisco which was damaged by the earthquake and fire, and for damages to the main Government building of the Panama Exposition by storm. There are several other instances I could cite, including the damage to the Baltimore customhouse by fire. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has taken similar action, and so has the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The purpose of this bill is not to allow the beneficiaries under it any profit at all but merely to reimburse them for losses which they sustained as a direct result of the action of the Government. It also covers the increase in the cost of materials and of labor due solely to war conditions, the action of the United States Priority Board, and the commandeering of materials, labor, and plants, which frequently occurred during the war. In many instances the congestion in railroad traffic as a result of war shipments was such that these contractors could not get the necessary materials and were therefore unable to go forward with the work.

A number of these contractors are now on the verge of bankruptcy, and I understand to-day that some of them have already gone into bankruptcy because of the delay in giving them this relief. My judgment is, and it is the unanimous judgment of the committee, that this proposition is merely an act of good faith on the part of the Government in reimbursing men who were under contract with the Government, one of the contracting parties responsible for the losses they have sustained.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. This only affects buildings under the Treasury Department?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; except the Washington courthouse and the Lincoln Memorial wall, which were not under the supervision of that department.

Mr. MANN. What is the estimate as to the amount which is thought may be involved under this bill?

Mr. LANGLEY. The Acting Supervising Architect of the Treasury estimates that it will be in the neighborhood of $2,000,000. Perhaps it will be a few thousand over that amount or under that amount.

Mr. MANN. Did the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds consider in any way what it might cost if applied generally throughout the Government, not only as to public buildings but as to shipbuilding and everything else that the Government dealt with?

Mr. LANGLEY. We did not, because we went only as far as we thought the jurisdiction of our committee permitted us to go. We did not go into that question. That is a matter for Congress to decide hereafter.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that if the Government ought to relieve a contractor on a post-office building it ought to relieve a contractor for building a naval vessel or a lighthouse tender, or constructing a road, or anything of that kind, under the same terms?

Mr. LANGLEY. If the contract was entered into prior to the war, and if the loss was sustained by the contractor as a direct result of the action of the Government, one of the contracting parties, I should think the same equity would exist. But we did not go into that, because that was not within our jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand this is where the Government interfered directly.

Mr. LANGLEY. Oh, yes. The action of the Priority Board and other Government war activities, as the result of which these contractors were unable to carry out their contracts with the Government except at a loss, is what we are seeking mainly to remedy.

Mr. MANN. Of course, whatever rule is adopted here eventually will be adopted as to all other branches of the Government, either by general legislation or by claims to Congress, and nobody knows what it will cost.

Mr. LANGLEY. Of course, I can not say as to that. I know that precedents have already been established, as I stated awhile ago. It has been done in a number of instances, and in some instances where the loss was merely the act of God, whereas in this case it was the act of one of the contracting parties—the Government itself—and I think this fact increases the obligation on the part of the Government to reimburse the loss which the Government itself caused the other contracting party to undergo.

Mr. MANN. The Government must stand the loss. If the man wins, he puts it in his pocket.

Mr. LANGLEY. No; it merely reimburses to some extent the losses the Government caused him to undergo.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. I will.

Mr. CANNON. We passed an act validating, for instance, contracts where the statute was not complied with when they were made. This bill provides for cases where the Government has commandeered. I know of instances where the Government did commandeer much of the material, some on the ground, and took that, and then commandeered the whole outfit for the purposes of the Government, where the contractor had made his contract for the supplies. I have read the bill, and if the gentleman will indulge me for a moment——

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; go ahead.

Mr. CANNON. It is, in my opinion, a just and proper bill, and it is a mere bagatelle in comparison with what the Government has already validated, and I think validated properly.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and ask that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] use some of his time.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me first?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I can readily understand why the Government should have some obligation to make a proper adjustment with contractors where it had interfered by commandeering labor or material. But does the gentleman think that the Government ought to make settlement with contractors to reimburse them for the increased cost of labor and material that has not any relation to the action of the Government?

Mr. LANGLEY. I do, where the loss is a direct result of the condition of war which arose after the contract was entered into. We were very careful to guard against including any case where the contract was not entered into prior to the declaration of war.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Could it not be said in any case that the advance in the cost of labor and materials was due to the war?

Mr. LANGLEY. No; the distinction is very clear, to my mind, and I think the bill as reported clearly defines that.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DARROW having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following title:

H. R. 6692. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the White River at or near Forsyth, Mo.;

H. R. 5648. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Rainy River between Spooner, Minn., and Rainy River, Province of Ontario, Canada;

H. R. 5228. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Minneapolis, a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River;

H. R. 6438. An act authorizing the counties of Aiken, S. C., and Richmond, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Augusta, Ga.;

H. R. 6805. An act to authorize the county of Dougherty, State of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Flint River, connecting Broad Street, in the city of Albany, said State and county, with Isabella Road, said county and State;

H. R. 6342. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, at the town of Usk, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 6434. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River about 2 miles above its confluence with Washita River, near Preston, Grayson County, Tex.;

H. R. 6450. An act to amend an act entitled "An act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, as amended"; and

H. R. 2847. An act providing additional aid for the American Printing House for the Blind.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS AND SUBCONTRACTORS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CLARK of Florida rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I believe I can satisfy the House in a very few words that this bill ought to pass.

I want to make the statement, first, that we have not provided in this bill for the payment of a single dollar which, if the other party at interest was an individual, these contractors could not go into the court and sue and recover. The Government, on account of its sovereignty, of course, can not be sued, but if an individual had committed the acts and had done the things which the Government did and caused the loss which these acts did cause, that individual would have been held liable in damages in any court in this land.

Now, what are the facts? The facts are that these people entered into contracts with the Government when we were in a state of profound peace, when the price of materials and the price of labor were peace-time prices. The war came on. The hearings will show that in numbers of instances the Government went into the identical cities where these contracts were being performed and instituted great works, which made a great demand for labor and for materials and raised the price of labor, took the workmen away from these contractors, and made them pay exorbitant prices for both their material and labor.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In a moment. In other instances they commandeered the plants with which these contractors had contracted for materials, and made it utterly impossible for the materials to be delivered to them. So we have provided in this bill, if the gentleman will look at the language of it, that they are to be paid only an amount sufficient to reimburse them for the loss by reason of the increased cost; they are not to get any profit by the terms of the bill; they are not to be made whole on their contracts, but they are simply to be reimbursed in the amount that they actually lost by reason of the activities of the Government of the United States.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. I understood that there would be nothing paid to these contractors except what they could collect in a court of equity.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is all.

Mr. SNELL. Were the Government contractors in any different position from private contractors who had taken contracts to build buildings, in this city, for instance, before the war?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Very much different.

Mr. SNELL. What was the difference?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the contractor had contracted with a private individual it was beyond the power of the private individual to do what the Government did and thereby bring about the loss that he suffered.

Mr. SNELL. He was subject to the same conditions. The cost of material and labor went up on him.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is true; but it was not caused by the act of the other contracting party, as in this case. The Government was one of the contracting parties here.

Mr. SNELL. And for that reason it was the cause of the increased cost of labor and it should be subject to penalties. Is that the ground?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If I made a contract with the gentleman from New York to-day, and after that contract had been entered into in good faith by both of us, the gentleman from New York had it in his power to commit certain acts which made my labor and material cost me more, and it was directly attributable to his act, I could go into the courts of this country and make him pay me for it. But you can not go into the courts and make the Government pay for it.

Mr. SNELL. Why is not the Government responsible for the losses of the private contractors, too?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The Government had no contractual relation with those other people. That makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am in accord with what the gentleman is saying, but I was wondering whether this language is not much broader than what the gentleman was saying. On line 7, page 2, the bill states, "due either, first, to increased cost of labor or material; or, second, to delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other governmental activities," and so on.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The delay on account of the action of the Priority Board.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Would not that increased cost of labor be due to the delay? Ought you to separate these two causes in that way? I agree with the gentleman perfectly that if the increased cost is due to the intervention of the Government, then the Government should afford some relief. But as to the increased cost of labor and material, if it is not due to the interference of the Government, then they ought not to be relieved. Is that right?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman will notice that this is a bill undertaking to deal with simply one class of contractors, those contracting with the Government.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I understand.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now listen: This applies to one class of contractors, having contracts with the Government, where the contracts "were awarded, or whose bids, as thereafter accepted, were mailed or delivered to the proper governmental authority prior to the entrance of the United States into the war with Germany, to wit, April 6, 1917, and whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date, for increased costs thereafter arising from, due either, first, to increased cost of labor and materials"——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That might have no relation to the action of the Government.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Brought about by the war.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Then you throw the thing wide open, so that it covers every increased cost of labor or material.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Just a minute. I have not finished—

Due either, first, to increased cost of labor or materials——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is one.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let me finish this—or, second, to delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other governmental activities; or, third, to commandeering by the United States Government of plants or materials shown by the Secretary of the Treasury to have been sustained by them in the fulfillment of such contracts by reason of war conditions alone.

That last clause covers all that precedes it. There is no question about it. The committee were particular to wipe out all question of a profit, and would not even consent to make them whole on their contracts, but simply thought this provision was necessary, as a matter of justice and fairness and good conscience. I want to say to the gentleman that I have none of these contractors in my district or in my State. I am not acquainted with them except some whom I have met here, but it was a matter that appealed to my sense of justice and to the sense of justice of the committee, and we felt that it was nothing but right that these men should be saved the increased cost which the action of the Government brought upon them.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I simply want to get it clear in my own mind. Under this bill the Government would be required to make proper adjustment of contracts, because labor and material had advanced because of general war conditions and not because of any direct interference on the part of the Government by commandeering or otherwise. Is not that correct?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I think not.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For a question.

Mr. EDMONDS. Has your committee taken into consideration the enormous amount of claims that the establishment of this precedent will bring upon the Government?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, no. Let me say to the gentleman that the precedent has already been set in the river and harbor bill for the payment of claims like this. It was set in the Panama Exposition case. It was set in the Baltimore Subtreasury case. It has already been set. But the amount makes no difference. If it is the duty of the Government to pay them, we have no right in good conscience to take into consideration the question of the amount of money that will be required, and we have no right to hesitate on that account. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to receive fully itemized and verified claims and reimburse contractors and their subcontractors, including material men, for the construction, improvement, special repair, equipment, or furnishing of post offices and other buildings or work under the supervision of the Treasury Department (as well as the United States courthouse in the District of Columbia and the approaches and retaining wall to the Lincoln Memorial in the District of Columbia) whose contracts were awarded or whose bids as thereafter accepted were mailed or delivered to the proper governmental authority prior to the entrance of the United States into the war with Germany, to wit, April 6, 1917, and whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date, for increased costs thereafter arising from, due either, first, to increased cost of labor or materials, or, second, to delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other governmental activities, or, third, to commandeering by the United States Government of plants or materials shown to the Secretary of the Treasury to have been sustained by them in the fulfillment of such contracts by reason of war conditions alone: Provided, That any subcontractor may submit his claim through the contractor or to the Secretary of the Treasury. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to submit from time to time estimates for appropriations to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided further, That no claims for such reimbursement shall be paid unless filed with the Treasury Department within three months after the passage of this act: And provided further, That in no case shall the contractor or subcontractor be reimbursed to an extent greater than is sufficient to cover his actual increased cost in fulfilling his contract or subcontract, exclusive of any and all profits to such contractor or subcontractor; nor shall such reimbursement include any advances or payments made by the sureties of such contractor or subcontractor in executing the work, but the surety on any contract coming within the provisions of this act who, as surety, has completed, or may complete, the work of any defaulting contractor on any such contract, or who has furnished financial assistance to a failing contractor on any such contract whereby such contractor has been enabled to complete such contract, may file claim within the period hereinbefore fixed and be reimbursed in the manner hereinbefore provided for the increased cost due to the causes hereinbefore specified of the labor and material supplied in so completing any such contract, or for the increased cost of the labor and material paid for from funds so furnished by such surety: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress at the beginning of each session thereof the amount of each expenditure and the facts on which the same is based.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike out the words "from, due either, first, to" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "from."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 2, line 7, after the word "arising" strike out the words "from, due either, first, to" and insert in lieu thereof the word "from."

Mr. MADDEN. Then I move to strike out the words "or second" in line 8, and insert the word "due" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, after the word "material" strike out the words "or second" and insert in lieu thereof the word "due."

Mr. MADDEN. In line 10, strike out the word "third" after the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, page 2, strike out the word "third" after the word "or."

Mr. MADDEN. Let the Clerk report it as it will read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

And whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date, for increased costs thereafter arising from increased cost of labor or materials, due to delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other governmental activities, or to commandeering by the United States Government of plants or materials shown to the Secretary of the Treasury to have been sustained by them in the fulfillment of such contracts by reason of war conditions alone.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We have no objection to that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a great many public buildings were contracted to be erected by the Treasury Department before the war began, and the contractors started on the work. They had purchased material and had performed a great deal of work when war was declared. Then, as one of the functions of the Government, a Priority Board was established, to give priority to the movement of materials and supplies necessary to the successful conduct of the war. Among other things done by the Priority Board was an order to prohibit the delivery of material for any buildings of any kind throughout the United States except such buildings as were important and necessary in the conduct of the war. That made it impossible for these men who had contracted with the Government to proceed under their contracts. Then frequently, in cases where material and supplies had been purchased and delivered before the Priority Board acted, the Government commandeered the material for war purposes, and frequently commandeered the labor, and that frequently placed the contractor in a position where it was impossible for him to carry to a successful conclusion the work that he had contracted to perform.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I agree with the gentleman. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Ought not the gentleman to go a step further and, in line 13, strike out the words "war conditions alone" and insert the words "such action of the Government"?

Mr. MADDEN. I presume that would be entirely proper, but I want to explain the amendment as far as I have gone. My own judgment is that the language in the bill as reported by the committee will compel the Government to make settlement purely for increased cost of material, whether the Government had anything to do with it or not. My judgment is, and what they ought to do is, to connect the responsibility of the Government up so that when the settlements are made as the result of the investigation the settlements will be made on the basis of Government responsibility, arising from the increased cost of labor or materials, due to the delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or Government activity or to commandeering by the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Would not the purpose of the gentleman be accomplished more simply if he struck out, in line 7, everything after the word "from," and, in line 8, everything up to the word "delay," so that it would read:

And whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date, for increased costs thereafter arising from delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other governmental activities, or, third, to commandeering by the United States Government of plants or materials shown to the Secretary of the Treasury to have been sustained by them in the fulfillment of such contracts by reason of war conditions alone.

Mr. MADDEN. It would accomplish the same purpose, and perhaps it would be more clear.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Is it the gentleman's purpose to limit this to cases where the increased cost is due solely to the Government or the Priority Board or the commandeering plan?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does not the gentleman think that where the Government came into a community where a man was undertaking to perform a contract and raised the price of labor and material——

Mr. MADDEN. The language I propose would cover all that, because it does not make any difference whether the Government commandeered the material or the labor.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not speaking of commandeering, but if the Government came into the market and raised the price of labor or raised the price of material in a way that took the workmen away from the contractor or prevented him from procuring material, does not the gentleman think that the man ought to have some redress?

Mr. MADDEN. I think that if you leave the door open to all kinds of reasons for claims against the Government you will never know where the bills will soar to. My judgment is that with the language proposed in the amendment I have offered, and as suggested to be modified by the gentleman from Michigan, you have given the contractor complete opportunity of presenting every legitimate claim to which he is entitled.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think the difficulty about the gentleman's amendment is that it does not provide for relief in a case like this, where the Government paid higher prices for labor than the contractor could pay to carry out his contract. Those contractors are just as much entitled to relief as if the Priority Board had commandeered the material. We had before our committee a number of contractors, stating specifically that they were unable to get labor, that they had left them by scores because the Government was offering higher prices for labor.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say that wherever the Priority Board from any action, whether it was with respect to the supply of materials or to take away the materials or supplies, or any other action, so that it cost the contractor more than it would have cost him if they had not acted, is covered in the language that I suggest and meets every legitimate claim to which any man has a right under his contract.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I hope the committee will consider this proposed amendment very carefully before they vote in favor of it. I fear if it is adopted that it will practically destroy the purpose of the measure. The increased cost of material and the increased cost of labor due to direct action of the Government not only through its Priority Board but through its other agencies and activities has been the cause of this great loss to these contractors. For instance, when these contractors took the contracts for building these public buildings they figured upon labor at a certain fixed price, with a certain margin for a natural rise. They figured upon material in the same way. They figured upon paying for a man and his team, for example, at the rate of $5 a day. The Government, immediately when the war broke out, went into these several communities and commenced bidding for labor, and caused the $5 a day team and man to rise in one jump to $16 a day. That was the direct action of the Government through the Government's agents, and the Government was entirely responsible for it. The contractor had absolutely no control. He could not compete with the Government in bidding for this character of labor. The result was that his labor was taken away from him.

That is not the only case. During this period it was absolutely impossible for the contractor to get a loan of a dollar for the purpose of completing these buildings unless he came here and got a permit from the loan board, and he could not get that permit unless he could establish that it would substantially aid the Government in the prosecution of the war, and in the erection of these Government buildings, such as the Lincoln Monument, it was held that they could well be deferred, and he could not make that showing, and that resulted in very great loss.

Mr. HERSEY. And the gentleman also understands that the taking over of the railroads was another cause, with their priority orders.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And as has been suggested by the gentleman from Maine, they issued priority orders with reference to the moving of cars, and I know it to be a fact that the stone industries of southern Indiana were absolutely prohibited from moving a stone because of the fact that they could not get the cars, and the contractors for the public buildings in the city of Washington who were depending upon those stone quarries were unable to get their material. These losses were due absolutely to the activities of the governmental agencies, and these are the things that resulted in the loss covered by this bill. If this amendment be adopted, the principal purpose of this bill in doing justice to these men who have been wronged by the direct action of the Government will fail, and they will get no relief, or will fail to get the relief that it was intended they should get by the enactment of this bill into law.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is it not a fact that in the erection of all public institutions freight on the railroads is the greatest proportion of expense, and is it not a fact that because of the war with which the contractors had nothing to do freight rates were so increased as to materially enhance the cost of construction, and under the amendment proposed no relief is offered in that respect.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is no question about that.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it proposed to constitute the House of Representatives into a general court of equity to reimburse every man, woman, and child on account of the war for their losses sustained in all directions?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; that is not the purpose of the bill, and I think that is quite beside the matter that we are now considering. However, it ought to be the purpose of the House of Representatives, as a branch of the Government, to see to it that people they are here to represent are not wronged by the Government. It was not the intention of the House of Representatives when it made it possible for the Government to enter into contracts that by subsequent action of the Government the contractors should suffer loss. The law making it possible for these contracts to be entered into was made in time of peace, and it had in its purview the thought that the contracts would be made in time of peace and under normal conditions. The Government in good faith entered into the contract in time of peace, under normal conditions and the contractor on the other side did likewise. Each endeavored to carry them out until the war came along when normal conditions were upset. The contractors were bound under their contracts to complete these buildings in a certain limited time. The Government itself is the one that is responsible for this. We are a part of the Government. This House of Representatives is a part of the Government, and we are responsible in a measure to these gentlemen so far as our moral obligation is concerned to see to it as their Representatives that no wrong should come to them by reason of our act and by reason of the acts of governmental agencies. [Applause.] That is all I desire to say.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota: Page 2, line 7, after the word "from," strike out all of line 7 and up to the word "delay" in line 8 and the words "third, to" in line 10.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, in that event the proposed bill would read:

Arising from delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other Government activities or commandeering by the United States Government of plants and materials shown to the Secretary of the Treasury to have been sustained by them in the fulfillment of such contracts.

And so forth.

It seems to me that if we are to pass the bill at all we should eliminate the first proviso, so that we compensate only for the direct positive action of the Government arising out of the action of the Priority Board or by action of other governmental officers in commandeering.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I feel that we should be absolutely fair with everyone, but in my judgment if this bill is passed in its present form it opens up as much real lightning as has come into this Congress in any session yet. And so far as I can see from the bill itself there is not one single safeguard in it. You simply present your claim, a wide-open claim, to the Secretary of the Treasury and receive your pay. Now, the evidence that was given before the committee a year ago, September, 1918, claimed that the contractors would all fail in 30 or 40 days. The same evidence was presented again here that the contractors are going to fail in 30 or 40 days if they do not get this absolute relief. It seems to me that it is the same old program of opening up the Treasury. The gentleman from Indiana says we must legislate for all. The men before the Committee on Rules this morning stated that there were about 100 contractors affected by this legislation. There are a certain lot of taxpayers who will be affected on the other side by the legislation we pass in its present form.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I do.

Mr. LAYTON. These contractors if they were not actually engaged in building these public buildings and post offices were engaged in governmental work at 10 per cent plus?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, no.

Mr. LAYTON. Why not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They are different contracts altogether.

Mr. SNELL. According to this bill, every contract so broken up and material so commandeered is entitled to come in under it for relief. Certainly the conditions were not safe in April, 1917. Everything was up in the air, and the man who took a contract then took it because he thought he was going to make money on it; and if you are going to open at one place you have got to open up all clear through the whole line. A man who furnished anything for the Government and lost money on it is entitled to be reimbursed by the Government. If you are going to reimburse the fellow who built the public buildings——

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman will permit, I desire to state that we have before the Claims Committee hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of claims of the departments along this same line, and if we open up the gate we have simply got to pass those claims, because we have established a precedent.

Mr. SNELL. If we open it up in this condition without any restrictions, you have no excuse whatever in the world for not paying all of these hundreds of million dollars of claims before the Committee on Claims at the present time.

Mr. LANGLEY. What are those claims?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know; but the Committee on Claims——

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman says hundreds of millions; I do not know of any such situation.

Mr. SNELL. There is the chairman of the Committee on Claims; he can state.

Mr. LANGLEY. The proviso limits it to this bill.

Mr. SNELL. Your bill only calls for claims amounting to about $2,000,000.

Mr. LANGLEY. I know; but this applies only to contracts on Government buildings entered into prior to the declaration of war.

Mr. SNELL. We start by taking down the doors. Let us take the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and put some bars on this bill. If you do not you have thrown the Treasury wide open, and I do not see a hope in the future. I hope the amendment will be accepted.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this bill from the committee covers the ground as it ought to be covered. What is it. Let me read—whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date, for increased costs thereafter arising from, due either, first, to increased cost of labor or materials, or, second, to delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other governmental activities, or, third, to commandeering by the United States Government of plants or materials shown to the Secretary of the Treasury to have been sustained by them in the fulfillment of such contracts by reason of war conditions alone.

Now, then, this does not apply to a contract that was let after the war began. The claims the gentleman speaks of as being before his committee, I dare say, are claims on contracts or services performed after the war, contracts expressed or implied. These are contracts——

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I can not now. I have only five minutes. These contracts were made before the war. You all know how little contractors throughout the country, I know several in Illinois, many of them were contracts to construct public buildings, men of means, mechanics in many instances, I have instances in my town, who lost $50,000 on a contract that they made months before. And how did they make their contracts? Why, they go to work and find out what the prices are.

A careful man contracts with the fellow who makes the lumber, who makes the hardware——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield. I will if I can get more time.

Now, that was the condition in one case of which I know. What happened? Some of the material was on the ground. The Government came along and commandeered that material. What else? They shut off the shipment of other material that had not been delivered to him. What else? They shut off the railroad transportation. What else? For Government construction and Government work the prices went way up, until they absolutely had to drop the whole thing in despair. Now, that contract may or may not have been complied with. I do not know whether it has been or not, but if it was complied with there was a loss. What for and what from? First, from the commandeering of the stuff that had been delivered.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If it was not complied with, his bond was responsible for it, and so he lost anyhow.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. Look at it from every standpoint. Here are people who made these contracts with the Government before the war. The war came. And as the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] has said, in God's chancery, in good morals, legally—and you can not sue the Government—the Government ought to pay the damages. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan and Mr. GRIFFIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], a member of the committee.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know of any bill ever considered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds which received more deliberation and more careful attention by that committee before coming to the floor of this House than this one. The bill in its original form, without many of the modifications and perfections which appear in this bill, was reported out prior to the adjournment of the last Congress by a unanimous committee; and the report of our lamented colleague from Alabama, Judge Burnett, would furnish very excellent reading for the gentlemen who wish enlightenment upon the justice and wisdom of the measure. It was also reported out to the present session of Congress unanimously.

Now, I have the greatest esteem and respect for both of the gentlemen who have offered amendments to this section, but, with all due humility and all due deference, I want to say to those gentlemen that I believe they are barking up the wrong tree. They are trying to do what? They are trying to eliminate from this bill the real essence of the bill itself. They are taking the very meat out of the coconut. The part of the bill which is of any moment is that which concerns the reimbursement of the contractors for their losses——

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will in just a moment.

For their losses after the beginning of the war, due to increased cost of labor and material. Now, everyone knows—and we may all take judicial notice of the fact—that labor and material are certainly, in many contracts, the very foundation of the claim, and that labor and material enter most largely into the cost of construction.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ELSTON. The gentleman has expressed in his description of what this bill is intended to cover an idea, I believe, that goes all through the bill. The gentleman said this bill was intended to reimburse the contractor for loss caused by increased cost. If the gentleman will examine every phase in the bill describing what is to be covered by reimbursement he will see that the word "loss" is not mentioned once, or bankruptcy, or anything else importing that only contractors who suffer loss are to be relieved. All you do is to reimburse them for increased cost.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman is wrong. I know there is not any such word as "loss" in the bill——

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Wait a moment—but increased cost means loss. That is the deduction I make, and this is justified by the existence in the bill of the limitation that prevents them from making any claim against the Government in the way of profit. It is a fair deduction from the context of the bill. Of course, lawyers will differ, as doctors do, but that is my conception of the bill, that there is no provision whatever for the payment of any profit to these men, and it is intended in good faith to only reimburse them for their losses due to increased cost——

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield? At the bottom of page 2——

Mr. GRIFFIN. Pardon me. Do not take my time.

The gentleman pointed out the line; let me go ahead and make an answer. Here is the point. These men——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California withdraw his request?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California withdraws his request. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would direct the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], inasmuch as this is a continuation of our colloquy, to line 6, where the reason for reimbursement is first given. It is stated there that reimbursement shall be "for increased costs thereafter arising from," and so on.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Wait a minute, and I will answer that.

Mr. ELSTON. Let me proceed further just a moment. Would it not be opportune, and would it not clarify the purpose of the bill, to state "for losses caused by increased cost," so that you would then have a basis of calculation for reimbursement? In the same way why not go down to line 23 and say "sufficient to cover his losses by actual increased cost," and on page 3, where you speak of the surety, make it clear that you reimburse the surety for loss caused and not for increased cost alone. With the language as it is there might be a profit permitted on the portion of the contract to which the increased cost of material does not apply. Possibly the contractor had to get his material which is largely increased in cost as to only a portion of the contract. Now, possibly that increased cost for the pro rata portion of material may have affected his profit somewhat, but not wiped out the whole profit, and not reduced him to a net loss on the whole contract.

Now, I think that possibly the construction of that phrase at the bottom of page 2, which says, "exclusive of any and all profit to such contractor or subcontractor," might be construed to refer to profits arising out of the original costs of material and labor for which the material or labor for which he had to incur increased cost was substituted and would not wipe out all the profit.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Pardon me. I believe that is a question directed to me, which I am expected to answer.

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The construction of the committee was that the terms of this bill would absolutely eliminate any profit whatever upon the increased cost of material and labor. We did not pretend, however, to go behind the original estimates or try to eliminate or to deprive them of the profits to which they would have been entitled by their original contracts——

Mr. ELSTON. That is it exactly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Had the labor and material remained at the original figure on which they may have based a profit.

Mr. ELSTON. Then I may say they are not entitled to profits. That opens the whole business. This is a matter of grace to save them from ruin and bankruptcy.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman admits there is to be a profit.

Mr. ELSTON. No. The contractor who gets relief under the bill should be merely insured against loss.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, may I have one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELSTON. My point, in short, is that if the contractor expected to make 20 per cent profit and it was reduced to 10 per cent by the increased cost of labor or material, or both, he should get no relief.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Oh, no. That is impossible. The cost of labor and material was doubled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, this language was very carefully and thoroughly gone over, not only by the entire committee after the subcommittee had made two or three different drafts of it, but it was also gone over in detail with the Acting Supervising Architect of the Treasury and other officials of the Treasury, and this is the exact language, after considerable revision and careful thought and discussion, which was agreed upon by us all.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. In a moment I will yield. Please wait until I finish this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think this language in the bill carefully safeguards the interests of the Government in every way. The language at the bottom of page 2 makes it entirely clear that the contractor or subcontractor in no event is to get any profit. That is made absolutely clear and specific in the bill, it seems to me.

Mr. GRIFFIN. As a matter of fact, under the terms and conditions of the bill he could not have any profit.

Mr. LANGLEY. No; he could not be allowed any profit, because the bill applies only to cases in which the contractor has lost as a result of carrying out his contract, due solely to war conditions, and only to the extent of such loss.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the fact that it is limited to the actual increased cost brought about by these conditions?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; that is correct; and, besides, it is specifically provided that he shall not receive any profit as the result of this adjustment by the Treasury Department. Many of these contractors have put thousands of dollars of their own money into these buildings for the Government and have lost it, and the Government has received the benefit of it. I do not believe that the Government of the United States can afford to put itself in the attitude of permitting those men to put up their own money and lose it when it was not their fault, but when it was due to conditions that they could not foresee, over which they had no control, and for which the Government, one of the contracting parties, was responsible. [Applause.] If you strike out the language in the bill as proposed by this amendment, you will, in my judgment, defeat the main purpose of the bill, and I hope the committee will not do it. [Applause.]

Mr. BEGG. I should like to ask the gentleman if this is not general legislation for specific cases?

Mr. LANGLEY. As I said a while ago, we have had a number of other similar propositions that have already been approved by Congress, and that was general legislation for specific cases.

Mr. BEGG. This is general legislation, is it not?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; it is general legislation in a sense.

Mr. BEGG. And the remedies are specific, are they not?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; and that is generally true of all remedial legislation. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has jurisdiction of public-building matters. We did not go into the question of reimbursing contractors on other Government work, such as the Army or Navy, for instance. That is not a part of the business of our committee.

Mr. BEGG. Have you in this bill confined the cases that can be brought up if this bill is put on the statute books?

Mr. LANGLEY. Why, absolutely; and they are known to the Treasury Department. We have a list of them, a complete list.

Mr. BEGG. Would it not have been more enlightening and safer if you had listed those cases in this bill?

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not think that would have been the proper way to do it. We have carefully safeguarded that, and the limitations are clearly set forth.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Why not just admit that the gentleman could have done it better than we could?

Mr. LANGLEY. Very likely he could.

Mr. CRISP. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question, not exactly on this bill, but a matter over which he has control. I have a public building authorized under the act of 1913. The contract has never been let. They have advertised for bids, but they can not get a bid within the limit of cost. The Supervising Architect's Office advises me that there are about 116 other buildings throughout the United States in a similar condition. I should like to know if the committee has given any consideration to that matter with a view to bringing in a bill increasing the limit of cost of those 116 buildings?

Mr. LANGLEY. Although it is not germane to the pending proposition, I am glad to say that we have considered that situation, and we have decided to include all of these propositions in one general omnibus bill that we will report in December.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. BANKHEAD. A point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Debate on this amendment has long since been exhausted. We have been discussing it 45 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It seems to me that this is a question involving the integrity of the United States Government in respect of holding up the hands of its business people. We have had but one war like this. We probably will not have another set of conditions similar to these. Men have had no experience on which they could have formulated ideas as to what would happen to them as the war progressed. I am interested in this matter particularly as a question of decent governmental ethics. Beyond that I have a direct interest in the well-being of one concern whose case is set forth in this bill. In order that there may be no doubt about where I come in I call your attention to a provision in the bill for reimbursing people who furnished granite for the wall about the Lincoln Memorial in this city.

That quarry is in my neighborhood. Before the war the owners of the quarry proceeded without interruption toward the execution of that contract. When the war came there was great demand for labor in the neighborhood of that granite quarry. Qurrymen skilled in nothing else but that vocation were drawn upon by shoe factories, cartridge belt factories, machine shops, and so on, at wages running from two to three times those which they were getting in the quarry. Not only that, but they were drawn at such tempting wages 20 miles away, with their car fare paid to and from their work. What earthly show was there for the owners of the quarry under such conditions? They had the granite in the quarry and so there is no question of reimbursement for material, but the whole consideration is the matter of labor. The owners were told when the war came on that they must finish the contract and the supply of granite.

Good fellows that they were, good patriots that they were, good business sports that they were, in the face of sure loss they borrowed money of banks, piled up the granite, and what happened then? Not only did they lose the profit which might have been made under ordinary conditions, not only did they work on in the face of sure loss, but when the time came to ship the granite, war having come on, they were not able to send forth any finished granite.

One of the provisions, if I am not mistaken—and I say "mistaken" for the reason that there were three quarries in trouble and they had about the same experience—one of the provisions, I believe, in their contract for the Lincoln Memorial was that the contractor should not get his money until the granite was landed over on the ground at the monument. The Government would not furnish the cars. There they were, plodding along, borrowing money on a Government contract, trying to fulfill it like honest business men, and then the Government with its one hand demanding the granite laid on the ground and with the other refusing to pay for it, and if it had had a third hand that would not furnish him the cars to take the granite away.

Now, the question comes down to solid foundation, and that is the point I want you to consider. If that concern does not get the money on which they have run behind, they are broke.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. Now, does this Government, at a time like this, want to say to a young struggling business concern, "We are not going to let you have your pay because you did not happen to have a contract covering unforeseen emergencies; you can go on and do what you please, we do not care"? The Government of the United States in all business undertakings ought to set the example of equity, decency, and generosity in business methods. [Applause.]

If we as legislators can not do it, we can not expect it from anybody else. Why should we complain of a half ignorant fellow trying to do the best he can, struggling along with a shoe-string capital, when he fails to measure up in fairness, yet we squawk and get out from under our moral obligations to our business institutions? [Laughter and applause.]

We have by legislation already taken care of the lame duck who did not happen to have a fixed contract for work which he had undertaken with one or another of the departments—the Ordnance, the Quartermaster, or what not. He did not have a contract because, perhaps, he was not wise as to the fussy methods of the Government in making contracts. I do not mean "fussy methods" in any invidious way, but there never was any concern that did make a correct contract with the Ordnance or other department which was not well fortified with legal talent.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. When I get through, I shall be delighted. The Government is held by our legislation to provide for the fellow who, through inadvertence, did not actually have a legal contract, and on checking up and proving his accounts in the proper way he is being paid, and that to the glory of our country and our Government and not to its disparity. [Applause.]

We are sending money to every clime we can think of under one pretext or another. We are doing everything to show the open heart and the open hand. When it comes to this line of people, represented by these particular business concerns covered by this bill, or to an endless line, so far as we can imagine, if their claims are meritorious, why do we not show the same decency to our own people that we are showing those of foreign lands? [Applause.]

One gentleman on the floor, I do not remember which one, pertinently asked if such a bill would be collected under private contract. I do not know much about the private-contract business when it comes to a discussion of law, but I do know and every business man in this House knows and every corporation lawyer in this House knows that there have been cases innumerable, not only now in this war period but in the past, as long as any of us can remember, where people having contracts with others, who have failed for one reason or another or who found themselves unable to go on, have been reimbursed for their losses, and so put on their feet, by those for whom they were working out contracts. Why, my friends, there would not have been one-half the contracts in the war time executed for the Government which were executed if it had not been that somebody came forward and gave a lift to a fellow who started in and could not hold out. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I think this is one kind of legislation that we ought to consider very carefully, because what we do with reference to public buildings we will have to do all through the various departments of the Government. If we pass this bill and allow contractors to be reimbursed for extra cost of labor and material for which the Government itself is not directly responsible—make it as broad as that—we will have to do the same thing, of course, for contractors with the Navy and the Army and all other departments of the Government. I can readily understand how there ought to be adjustments made where the Government itself interfered with the performance of the contracts by direct action. For instance, the Navy Department let a contract for a dry dock in Philadelphia. It is alleged that the Government stepped in and commandeered all of the cement in that region. The Labor Board fixed the price of labor for that region. Because of the increased cost of labor and material and the absolute inability to get the material, in some cases those contractors could not go forward with their work. In some cases, as gentlemen have suggested, the Government running the railroads gave other Government business preference, so that contractors could not get the material on time. It is obvious that in all those cases the Government ought to make adjustments. My judgment is that we ought to pass a general bill treating all contractors similarly situated alike, because if we have one rule for contractors with the Navy, another rule for contractors with the Army, and different rules for contractors with the Treasury Department it is going to make all sorts of confusion and discrimination. The whole matter of Government liability in cases of this kind should be considered. We do not know how much such a policy as this will cost the Government. My opinion is that if you pass this bill to-day and follow it up with similar bills for the relief of contractors with other departments it means hundreds of millions of dollars of expense to the Government of the United States. I do not know how many cases in the Navy there are like this.

But I have in mind a dry dock at Norfolk, a dry dock at Philadelphia, and public works for the Navy at nearly all the naval stations. The contracts were let prior to the war, and if we go ahead and make up to the contractor whatever he has lost by reason of the advance in the price of labor and material, where the Government was not directly responsible, then we will have a bill to pay so large that no man can make a guess as to what it will run into, and Congress ought not to act in that uncertain way and in the dark.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I understand it, that is not the question. This bill covers cases where the Government is responsible.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. This bill covers cases wherever labor and materials have advanced by reason of the fact that the United States has been at war. It is the broadest kind of a measure. Every advance in the price of material and labor will be assigned to that cause. The Navy Department and the War Department had contracts for food supplies, blankets, tentings, and materials of all kinds. We had contracts with the packers for meat to supply the Army and the Navy. Because of the war the price of all these things advanced. Are we ready to open up all these contracts and make adjustments because of such advance? This bill sets the pace. Whatever we do for these particular contractors covered by this bill will have to be done for others if we are to avoid the charge of discrimination. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois should be adopted. The bill will then be going far enough. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say a word to straighten out one matter here if I can. Gentlemen seem to be badly mixed up here upon certain features of this bill. In the first place, I want to say to the gentlemen that we are not making any new precedents here.

Congress reimbursed the contractor for his losses in the building of the main building at the Panama Exposition, which was destroyed by storm. Congress reimbursed the contractors for their losses when the Baltimore customhouse was destroyed by fire. Congress reimbursed the contractors for the San Francisco customhouse for their losses occasioned by the earthquake and fire, so we do not need any precedent. Here are losses growing out of actual contracts with the Government, and I want to say if the gentlemen will look at the bottom of page 2 of this bill they will find this statement, which covers the whole proposition and limits the amount of money that can be paid:

And provided further, That in no case shall the contractor or subcontractor be reimbursed to an extent greater than is sufficient to cover his actual increased cost in fulfilling his contract or subcontract, exclusive of any and all profits—

And so forth, and questions of that character.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not that guarantee the contractor all the profit that he had in his original contract?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not at all; it distinctly cuts it out.

Mr. DOWELL. No. This only affects the amount of the increase, but it leaves to him exactly the profit that he had when the contract was made, guaranteed by the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It does not leave a particle of profit, and anybody who understands the English language ought to realize it. It gives him enough to cover his actual increased cost in filling the contract. Increased what? Increased cost over and above what it did cost or would have cost at the time he made the contract, when he entered into it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have in my mind the same thought suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, who just——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to hurry on through, if I can.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes. The gentleman gives him the increased cost——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He may make a profit in any event; therefore he receives nothing. Why not recompense him for the loss?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. How can he make a profit? He pays $150, we will say, on a certain article which before the war would have cost $100.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You may figure that——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Wait a minute.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What we want to do is to make these people good for their losses, nothing else.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, that is exactly the thing the committee did not want to do. It is the very thing that we debated for a day or two at different meetings. We do not pretend to try to make these people whole. If we undertake to reimburse them for their losses, we are going to mulct the Government instead of for $2,000,000 for probably $10,000,000 before we get through with it. We propose simply to pay them back the money which they were forced to pay over and above what they would have expended if it had not been for the acts of the Government. That is all. We expressly stipulate that upon that they are not to get one single solitary cent of profit.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For a question.

Mr. UPSHAW. Does the gentleman think that the Government ought to refuse to pay one honest moral obligation for fear that it might have to pay another honest obligation at some other time?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not. I said that to-day.

Mr. UPSHAW. Of course not.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say again, Mr. Chairman, when the contractor enters into a contract—some gentlemen do not seem to understand it—when he bids upon a contract he files with it a certified check in a certain amount. Something has been said here to the effect that he was not forced to accept the contract after war had been declared. If he bid before war was declared and his certified check was on deposit in the Treasury Department and his bid was accepted by them, he either had to go forward and carry out the contract or forfeit the certified check that he had put up, and there was no way on earth for him to get out of it.

Now, these men have gone on and carried out their contracts in good faith. If this bill does not reach what the committee desire to reach, then we ask you to fix it so it will reach it. Do not sit here and growl about how we have drafted the bill. If you agree that it is honest and right and just that these men should be taken care of, for God's sake help us instead of standing up here and mouthing about the way in which we have drawn the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The whole gist of the bill is right here. I do not want to hear myself talk, but I am sick and tired of gentlemen getting up on the floor and suggesting there ought to have been a "t" crossed here or an "i" dotted there or a comma put in there or a semicolon somewhere else. For God's sake, if it is not right, offer amendments and make it right, but do not attempt to defeat it by this kind of procedure. Some gentleman objects because we have not gone out and hunted up all the claims against the Government and incorporated them in this bill. If we had brought in here the claims against the Navy Department and the War Department, a point of order would have been made against them and they would have gone out in the twinkling of an eye, and you gentlemen know it. We have jurisdiction only of questions of this character, and we have brought the bill in here to meet that issue. These men have honestly discharged their duty and the Government owes the money. A private individual who would not give them this measure of justice would be looked upon as a dishonest man, and the Government of the United States ought not to occupy that attitude.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, we have had liberal debate on this measure, and we ought to take up the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this bill and the amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman agree that I have two minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. LANGLEY. After the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] has had two minutes, I move that all debate——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that debate on the bill and pending amendments close in two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KREIDER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have two minutes in which to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to modify my request—that after five minutes the debate close on the bill and amendments thereto, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] have three minutes and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] two.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the debate on the bill and pending amendments close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I have an amendment I want to offer following this. Do I understand that this applies to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It does. Is there objection?

Mr. KREIDER. Do I get three minutes in the unanimous consent request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will again state his request. The Chair can not gather anything about it.

Mr. LANGLEY. I have stated it several times. I will make it 10 minutes, then. Some other gentlemen want to be heard.

Mr. CANNON. Why does not the gentleman move to close it in five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I object until we know what the request is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the request. It is that all debate on the bill and amendments close in five minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Two minutes to be consumed by the gentleman from Texas and three by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. I object.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is the bill now open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is. Objection was made to the request. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. There is a request for unanimous consent that has not been objected to.

Mr. SCOTT. I objected to it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in my own right.

Gentlemen, I have not bothered the House in the discussion of this matter. I have always been for an equitable adjustment of proper obligations of the Government. But my belief is that this bill will open a Pandora's box, from the fact that there will be no contractor who made a contract before we entered the war that will not come in for a readjustment of the difference between what that contract cost him and what it would have cost him but for the increased cost of labor and material. I think if you pass this bill without amendment you will set a precedent for other suits against the Government that may run into I do not know how many, but possibly hundreds of millions of dollars. That will be so, especially with respect to this last part, due to war conditions and the enhanced value due to war conditions; and there will not be a contractor who will not have a right to come to the Government and ask for an increase in his pay under this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be again reported as amended in that particular, if that amendment is agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that he be permitted to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be read which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that he be permitted to withdraw his amendment?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON]. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] asks that the amendment be reported and that the language be read as it will appear when amended. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota: Page 2, line 7, after the word "from," strike out all of line 7 and up to the word "delay," in line 8, and the words "third, to," in line 10, so that the language will read, "and whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date, for increased costs thereafter arising from delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other governmental activities or commandeering by the United States Government of plants or materials shown to the Secretary of the Treasury to have been sustained by them in the fulfillment of such contracts by reason of war conditions alone: Provided, That any subcontractor may submit his claim through the contractor or to the Secretary of the Treasury."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONTAGUE: Page 2, line 6, after the word "for," insert the words "loss due directly to," so that the language will read, "and whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date, for loss directly due to increased costs thereafter arising from."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHINDBLOM: Page 2, line 7, after the word "arising," strike out the the word "from."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. How will that read?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The word "from" is not in the original bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is in the original bill as reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has closed. The gentleman from Florida asks that the language be read as it will appear in the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date, for loss directly due to increased costs thereafter arising, due, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, all debate has closed. I now move that the committee rise.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND of Missouri: On page 2, line 5, after the figures "1907," insert "or within 10 days thereafter," so that the language will read, "to wit, April 6, 1917, and whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I move to amend on page 2, line 23, by striking out the words "increased cost" and substituting the word "loss."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: On page 2, line 23, after the word "actual," strike out the words "increased cost" and insert in lieu thereof the word "loss."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey demands a division.

Mr. LANGLEY. That will cost the Government a great deal more, gentlemen, if you adopt that.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order. The gentleman from New Jersey demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 69.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offer an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHINDBLOM: Page 2, line 11, after the word "materials," insert "such increased costs in every case being," so that the paragraph will read: "Or, third, to commandeering by the United States Government of plants or materials, such increased cost in every case being shown to the Secretary of the Treasury to have been sustained by them in the fulfillment of such contracts by reason of war conditions alone."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANGLEY. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6323) for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. When will a motion to recommit the bill be in order?

The SPEAKER. After the third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SNELL. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SNELL moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with instructions to that committee to report the bill back forthwith with the following amendment: After the word "from," in line 7, page 2, strike out the balance of the line and all of line 8, up to and including the word "to" and the words "third, to," in line 10.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. SNELL. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Seventeen Members, not a sufficient number.

Mr. SNELL. I ask for the other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the other side. The Chair will count.

Mr. HEFLIN. What was the demand, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demanded the other side. The Chair is counting to see whether 17 are a sufficient number. It only requires 86 to negative the demand, and there are more than that number present. So the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. SNELL. I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum present. It is evident that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is not necessary. It is an automatic call. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members. As many as are in favor of the motion to recommit will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 73, nays 195, answered "present" 2, not voting 160, as follows:

On this vote:

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky (for) with Mr. OGDEN (against).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LANGLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise in the RECORD my remarks I made this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an analysis of the soldiers' settlement bill by my colleague, Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein the life record of Edward N. Hurley, chairman of the Shipping Board, who retires to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to some facts in the career of Edward N. Hurley, of Wheaton, Ill., whose period of notable public service terminates with his resignation as chairman of the United States Shipping Board August 1.

It may cause surprise that I, a member of the political opposition to the administration with which Mr. Hurley has been associated, should turn aside from the accustomed business of the House to refer to the life of Mr. Hurley.

There is so much in his career, however, that is entirely dissociated from partisanship, so much of stalwart Americanism, of compelling energy and of inspiring example for young America, that I am not short of text when I offer this tribute to my fellow Illinoisian. The story of his career and achievement is a finely stimulating one for every young American.

The story of Hurley is the story of a union railroad shopworker who has reached a high pinnacle in the great crisis through which the world has so recently passed. His has been a varied career, one of intense activity and of the deepest human interest. And it makes good reading for our young crusaders who are launching out to-day at the bottom, with their vision and purpose focused on the top of things.

KNOX COUNTY.

Mr. Hurley was born in Galesburg, Ill., in July, 1864, not far from the town in the same county in which I was born. He got the foundation of an education in the public schools of the community. At the age of 14 he was already looking afield for broader opportunity. If he was to work in a machine shop, he wanted it to be a big machine shop. He had his eyes on Chicago. Out of his earnings he had accumulated $35. Thirty dollars of this he turned over to his mother as a contribution to the family war chest and with the remaining $5 he set forth to seek adventure and employment.

He found employment in the railroad shops of Chicago and his twenty-fourth year found him at the throttle of one of the big locomotives of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad. His record with the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy is that of an efficient engineer who had one of the best and smoothest working engines operating out of Chicago.

Hurley knew the point of view and the problem of the union man, of whom he was one. He participated in a strike on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, walked out with the engineers when his organization voted it, and found himself without a job. Then he began to look for other employment.

Clear-eyed, sincere, and confidence-compelling, young Hurley landed a job as traveling salesman for a metallic packing company of Philadelphia. In Chicago one afternoon he encountered a man who had been stoker on one of the engines Hurley had driven for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy. The stoker had a story to tell of a brother who was experimenting with a new kind of tool. The story aroused Hurley's interest. He sought the experimenter, examined his plans, drew up an agreement with him, and then the two rented a shanty where they devoted all of their time to perfecting the new device. With a donkey engine to turn their lathe, they worked away for months and finally evolved a model which they deemed presentable. Then Hurley set out to market the invention. Picture an unknown youth without influence or money trying to gain the ear of capital. The rebuffs would have disheartened one of less determination. But they did not dishearten Hurley. He had faith in that idea of pneumatic tool, but could find no one in America willing to finance it. It did not appeal; what were pneumatic tools, anyway? Where did they fit in? Moreover, executives were too busy with their own affairs to listen to importunate inventors.

Hurley refused to accept defeat and decided to take the idea to England. With characteristic energy he scraped enough for steamship passage to London, and there demonstrated to the satisfaction of English industrial experts the value of his pneumatic patents. A purchaser of the English rights was found, and late one foggy afternoon on the streets of London the young man found himself in possession of a check for $30,000. His first thoughts were of home. Half of the sum was cabled immediately to his mother, with the injunction that she purchase a home and move into it. He returned to lay the foundation of an enterprise which rapidly brought him into fellowship with the great industrial leaders of America. He was an organizer, president and treasurer of the Standard Pneumatic Tool Co. of Chicago from 1896 to 1902. In that year he sold out his interest in the American and English pneumatic tool companies and engaged in farm and stock raising at his country home at Wheaton. He then decided that he was through with money making and that henceforth he would give his interest to public affairs.

In 1913 he was appointed United States Trade Commissioner to the Latin American Republics. He went to South America at the head of a commission of Middle West business men which accomplished valuable pioneer work in the cementing of trade relations between the Latin Americas and the United States.

Appointed member of the Federal Trade Commission when that board was organized March 16, 1916, Mr. Hurley wielded a strong influence over the policy and character of this governmental organization. Upon our entrance into the war, the President commandeered his services for important national work. He was barely allowed to make good at one important war post before the President felt called upon to commandeer his services for another post.

His first war job was with the war council of the American Red Cross. With Henry P. Davison, Grayson M. P. Murphy, and Charles D. Morton he worked out the war organization of the Red Cross, which has rendered such notable service to stricken humanity. Then the President shifted him into the newly organized War Trade Board. The War Trade Board had a vital job to do at that time. The British blockade had proved effective, and German armies were being sustained by food and supplies obtained through neutral countries. At this post he aided in establishing a real export control that shut Germany off from the sinews of war.

Then came Hurley's biggest chance for honor and service. The President, discouraged at the Denman-Goethals shipping embroglio, decided to place the whole shipping problem in the hands of the level-headed business man whom he had watched function at three important Government posts.

When Hurley was called to the Shipping Board that body was not only without organization but was, in fact, disorganized. The War and Navy Departments had organizations dating back to the birth of the Nation. But the Shipping Board, a newly created body which had already made two false starts, could then be likened to a mob in a free-for-all scramble. And while those older organizations rested on rock foundations, this new one lay on quicksand which had already engulfed Bernard N. Baker, Goethals, and Denman.

Hurley confronted a situation that was unparalleled and fraught with enormous difficulties and unmatched perplexities. No ordinary compass could serve as a guide. We had ceased to be a maritime Nation. Our flag had gone from the ocean highways. Such few shipyards as we had were overcrowded with work for the Navy. There was no reservoir of shipyard managers to draw upon for this emergency; there were no workers skilled in shipbuilding to be had. Moreover, there was that disorganized body into which he had come, and on top of all was the insistent, the urgent and more urgent cry for ships.

The task he faced required an executive ability capable of rapidly bringing order out of chaos, of expeditiously grouping work to be done, and the sizing up of men capable of doing it. While sifting, sorting, coordinating, regulating, and systematizing the work of the confused organization into which he had been brought, Hurley was throwing every other ounce of his great energy into the gigantic task of building an enormous fleet of ships from the ground up—finding sites for the great number of shipyards that had to be built before the actual work of shipbuilding could be started, rushing contracts for their construction and for the buildings that were to house the workers, organizing and training the industrial army that was needed, stimulating their efforts with the glory of the winning of a pennant, mobilizing bridge and structural steel companies, contracting for their output to be employed in the fabricated ships, and inspiring all with his own energy and enthusiasm.

At that critical time German submarines were sinking ships faster than they were being built, and it was in the face of this appealing and ever-increasing loss in tonnage that America was preparing to hurry her armies across the ocean. The vital need was ships and more ships. It was no time for indecision—for dilatory methods. It was no hour for paying heed to carpers. And right here I wish to include what Hurley once told me was his favorite quotation, one from Dr. Jowett:

Don't apologize; don't explain; let 'em holler; get it done!

That one line explains Hurley. It has the old Farragut ring, "Damn the torpedoes; go ahead!" Hurley went ahead, and the work he accomplished will stand out in history as one of the epochal ones of the World War. I will quote a few statistics which give a graphic picture of what was done.

When Hurley took office as chairman of the Shipping Board all we had to show for our previous years of effort toward upbuilding a merchant marine was a total of 1,641 vessels, representing a gross tonnage of 3,729,436, chiefly coastwise, for our oversea tonnage was negligible.

Up to June 30 of this year there had been built and delivered to the Shipping Board 1,065 seagoing steamships—including 15 purchased Japanese vessels of 85,980 gross tons—representing 3,977,323 estimated gross tons. Under construction and soon to be completed were 631 steel vessels, aggregating 2,956,615 estimated gross tons—including 43 steel tugs, tonnage not figured. Under contract—keels not yet laid—were 311 steel steamships, aggregating 1,475,000 estimated gross tons, a total of 2,007 ships of 8,409,338 estimated gross tons.

Including 355 wood ships under construction (594,634 estimated gross tons), 12 concrete ships (49,000 tons) now building and 2 under contract (10,000 tons), and 6 composite ships (14,000 tons) under construction, the grand total of seagoing vessels built, under construction, and provided for is 2,382, of 9,076,972 estimated gross tons or 13,615,556 dead-weight tons.

This shows that since the present Shipping Board was organized there has already actually been added to our merchant fleet a total of 1,065 seagoing vessels of 3,977,323 estimated gross tons, with 1,004 of 3,614,249 estimated gross tons under construction and 313 of 1,485,000 estimated gross tons provided for, a grand total of 2,382 vessels of 9,076,572 estimated gross tons to be completed by July, 1920.

In comparison to this Great Britain, the leading shipbuilding and shipowning nation of the world, counts to-day only 15,000,000 gross tons under her merchant flag, even including small vessels down to 500 tons.

Upon our entrance into the war this Nation had only a few widely scattered shipyards. Although running full time on rush work for the Navy, these employed not more than 50,000 men. At the signing of the armistice we had 198 shipyards, with 1,083 launching ways, more than double the number in all the rest of the world. Employed in these shipyards was an army of more than 350,000 men.

Under control of the Shipping Board on the date the armistice was signed was a fleet of 2,112 seagoing vessels, representing a gross tonnage of 5,514,448. This did not include 583,000 gross tons of enemy vessels taken over, nor the 324,000 gross tons of Dutch ships which had been requisitioned.

The Shipping Board had turned over to the Army for its use in transporting and maintaining troops overseas more than 4,000,000 gross tons of shipping. Refutation of the repeated assertion that America had been almost wholly dependent upon British shipping for the period of the emergency is to be found in the published records of the War Department.

The construction department of the United States Shipping Board is twice as large as that of the United States Steel Corporation, while its operating expenses are equal to the combined expenses of the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Santa Fe. Congress has authorized $3,671,000,000, and up to the close of the fiscal year had appropriated $2,625,451,000 for the shipbuilding program. Hurley has had the handling of this enormous sum, and while there has been the inevitable waste inseparable from vast undertakings hurriedly rushed to completion during abnormal times, no one has ever charged that one dishonest penny ever passed through the hands of Edward N. Hurley.

From the time that he took charge the Shipping Board was coupled as a part of the machinery of war. It was called upon to compete with the organized branches of the Government in war activities, to obtain material and to mobilize a great army of workmen under war conditions, to perform a task that was essential to the winning of the war under restricted war powers that did not permit it to make use of military authority or laws, or to intrude or in any way interfere with activities on behalf of the military or naval arms of the Government or their allied industries.

There was at no time any intention or desire on the part of Hurley to ask for an extension of the board's powers in its urgent need for men and materials. Hurley was confident that he could muster all the men needed through patriotic appeal, and his confidence was not misplaced. In priorities in the matter of materials and transportation he was content to fight out his case on its merits, and he needed the same class of materials so urgently required for all phases of war industry. Again his record was one of success.

Hurley's job was to build ships, and his determination was to master and overcome the submarine menace, which at the time of the formulation of his shipbuilding program was accounting for ocean-going tonnage at a rate three times greater than it was being replaced, and threatening to clear the seas of merchant ships. At the close of hostilities he was building ships faster than they were being sunk, and the United States was replacing ships where other nations at war had failed.

Since the great machine which he had been driving ahead at full speed was slowed down with the signing of the armistice, he has been giving thought to the requirements of peace. One of his great accomplishments rests in the newly established trade routes which now reach from our ports to those of all the world. To-day there are 65 freight routes on which our cargo ships are sailing on regular schedule. For the first time in our history our busines men may now know when American oversea freighters are scheduled to start their voyages, and no longer is there need for our business men to wait for a foreign ship to oblige them by sailing.

There are now 174 steamships, of 900,870 gross tons, employed in these trade routes—routes that had been opened throughout the last six months as a first step toward the conversion of ocean tonnage released from war work to the usages of peace. All told, the Shipping Board now has 829 ships, of 4,248,973 deadweight tons—2,832,649 gross tons—engaged in general commerce, while upward of 2,500,000 tons of its shipping is yet employed in service for the Army and Navy and in relief work for oversea civilians.

Mr. Hurley has been a singularly conspicuous figure in the vital affairs of the war, and he lays down his responsibilities with the good wishes of the overwhelming mass of his fellow citizens. He has been honored by the distinguished-service cross, awarded by Gen. Pershing, and by an appointment as commander of the Legion of Honor at the hands of the President of France. He was the first civilian to enter Germany as a representative of the associated Governments in the negotiations for supplying food to Germany in consideration of Germany turning over its passenger ships to America for use in returning our soldiers. As chairman of the associated Governments' committee a contract was signed with German civilians—steamship owners and bankers—for the deliveries of these ships that were in German harbors during the war. These ships have been in service bringing back our soldiers. Mr. Hurley accompanied Marshal Foch to Germany, where negotiations with the German delegation were carried on at Treves.

In accepting Mr. Hurley's resignation, President Wilson wrote this splendid appreciation of his services:

As chairman of the Shipping Board you have done work of a very exceptional character both at home and abroad, and it is with genuine and very deep regret that I accept your resignation, only because you desire me to do so. It would not be just to insist upon your continuing. Yielding to your wishes I accept it, to take effect the 1st of August, 1919.

In more than one capacity you have served the country with distinction in these difficult times, and I am sure that you can carry away from your tasks the sense of duty well performed. No one ever served his country's interests more devotedly than did you, and personally I am deeply grateful to you. I am sure that my gratitude and appreciation are shared by all those who know the importance of the work you have done.

It is not without real significance that we note the concurrence of newspaper editors of opposing political faith in their estimate of Mr. Hurley's services. The great editorial department of the New York Sun, which seldom has an opportunity to commend an official of the Democratic administration, had this is to say about Mr. Hurley in the Sun of July 13:

MR. HURLEY OUT OF SHIPPING.

Mr. Hurley has quit the head of the Shipping Board, to the loss of our Government merchant marine, Mr. Wilson's administration, and the American public.

If one of the great problems of the war was how to get ships, one of the great problems now is what to do with them when we have them. Just as Mr. Hurley had a very clear vision about the way to get the ships—by putting on full steam, keeping it up, driving everybody and everything at top speed—he has had a very straight view as to stopping work on construction no longer needed, selling ships that could be marketed to advantage, and planning to put others in worth-while service. And in both the war field and peace field his confidence, his courage, and his punch were invaluable.

There was never much chance that in the long run our Government shipping could stand up against the competition of British shipping, of Dutch and Scandinavian shipping, of Japanese shipping when they get going again full swing. But Mr. Hurley's eye was quick to light upon the truth that the South American shipping trade could be made and should be made our own. He has been preparing to go into this important business in the biggest kind of way, with the fastest and the best freight and passenger steamers afloat. For the sake of ourselves, for the sake of South Americans, for the sake of the whole New World, he was going to link all the Americas closely together in a sea chain of transportation that would challenge the Old World to come and equal us.

It may be that Mr. Hurley's successor or somebody will see the needs and possibilities of a great shipping service between North America and South America as Mr. Hurley saw them. It may be that his plan will be followed as a national policy and program. But nobody else could follow it with such enthusiasm as Mr. Hurley himself would have followed it. Nobody else will put into it the same genius and power. Nobody else will be so sure of hammering it through to success.

The great Democratic organ—the New York Times—published the following sincere tribute in its issue of July 12:

Lack of zeal and of energy and devotion to the work in hand could never be charged against Chairman Edward N. Hurley, of the Shipping Board, whose resignation has just been accepted by President Wilson. Mr. Hurley was always a stimulating force, and in his public addresses his faith in building the ships to win the war never faltered. If he seemed too optimistic at times, it was not because he was credulous; as a business man he understood the difficulties of creating shipyards overnight, as it were, supplying them with material and recruiting the army of workmen required. Also he had no conceit about his familiarity with ship construction. But he knew that the way to keep everybody on the job and developing their utmost powers was to assume that the rank and file of the shipyard army was as much in earnest and as patriotic and stanch as he was. So he always preached the gospel of success and did not stick at prophesying more than was going to be accomplished.

As a kind of inspired, peripatetic, and indefatigable press agent Chairman Hurley never flinched from the task and worked 16 or more hours a day at high pressure. There may have been other men who knew more about shipbuilding than he did, but none who could better impersonate Uncle Sam determined to see it through. Mr. Hurley's statistics of promise and performance did not always hang together well; the critical might detect flaws in them; but inconsistency had to be risked sometimes and drawing the long bow attempted with a good grace.

It may be shown that mistakes were made in the shipbuilding program and that money was wasted in experiments, but there wasn't much time for the sagest calculation. The point was to get things done and strike a fair average of excellence, with the speed of performance always increasing. If the war had gone on the results would have been more striking and notable, but, as it was, a strong and enduring foundation was laid for an American merchant marine, and a good deal of the credit must go to Chairman Hurley. No man in his place could have attained 100 per cent of merit, but he finished his task with a remarkably good average of execution.

I hold no brief for the Democratic administration, but I do feel that Edward N. Hurley, of Illinois, has rendered service of which the whole Nation may well be proud. He was called upon in a crisis to do an unprecedented job. He was called upon to give the Nation something it had never had before—a great merchant fleet—and he had to do it in the midst of war. He organized the job and put it through. He fully deserves the approval the public has given him.

Backed by this fine record of achievement, Illinois may well be proud to class Edward N. Hurley with her other illustrious sons, and place his name high on the roll of honor in her hall of fame.

I happen to have the distinguished honor of representing in Congress the city in which Mr. Hurley now lives. That city, that county, and the eleventh congressional district of Illinois join in acclaiming him the most distinguished citizen. With all the honors that have been showered upon him, he is still the same model citizen and helpful neighbor that he was through all the years of struggle that prepared him in mind and heart to perform, modestly and conscientiously, the great task set before him by his country's needs.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the banking bill passed this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SESSIONS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs may sit during the recess of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs may sit during the recess. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BERT GALLAGHER.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Bert Gallagher be, and he is hereby, appointed a special employee and pair clerk under the resolution adopted by the House May 19, 1919, to be effective from July 1, 1919, until August 1, 1919.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to change the reference of the bill (H. R. 485) to increase the rates of pay of certain grades of officers from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the Committee on Military Affairs? Is there objection.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the necessity for meeting an hour earlier?

Mr. MONDELL. It will give us more time in which to pass certain measures that we desire to bring up. We expect to bring up in the morning a bill affecting the coastwise shipping, to be followed by some bills from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, is it the purpose of the gentleman, if this be granted, to move to adjourn?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following members of the Committee on the Budget, authorized this afternoon, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GOOD, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Mr. MADDEN, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. TEMPLE, Mr. TINKHAM, Mr. PURNELL, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. GARNER, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. HOWARD.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 1, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 1, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek mastery over every circumstance by the mastery of ourselves, by lives that are centered in God. We seek wisdom by contemplating the problems of life, by drawing from Thee that divine wisdom and grace that makes us wise in determining the justice of all affairs of life. We pray Thee to guide us this day that we may ever have our thoughts upon Thee, Thy law, Thy will, that this Nation may be a nation whose lord is God and whose laws are written after the divine order. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PROTOCOL TO TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY (S. DOC. NO. 66).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate having heretofore ordered that the treaty of peace with Germany be considered in open executive session, the Chair lays before the Senate the following message, and refers it, with the accompanying document, to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The message will be read.

The Secretary read the message, as follows:

To the Senate:

I have the honor to transmit to the Senate herewith, accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of State, a brief protocol to the treay of peace with Germany. The certified copy which I transmit has just been received by the Department of State, and I am transmitting it without delay.

The protocol originated in a written interchange of views between the representatives of the allied and associated powers and the representatives of Germany, as a result of which the representatives of Germany requested that certain explanations of methods and facilities which it was proposed should be accorded the German Government in the execution of the treaty should be reduced to writing and signed by the powers signatory to the treaty, so as to form a definite and binding memorandum.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
31 July, 1919.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said. I understand that the message of the President transmitting to the Senate a protocol relating to the treaty now before the Senate has been read. I move that, as in open executive session, it be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and that the injunction of secrecy be removed from it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled that that has already been done, but the question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I ought to have made the motion before.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATE OFFICE BUILDING COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate Office Building was erected under the supervision of the Senate Office Building Commission, provided for in the sundry civil bill approved April 28, 1904. That act authorized its construction under the supervision of a commission and placed the actual construction, letting of contracts, and employment of skilled and other services under the control of the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds, who still is acting as such.

The building is not yet wholly completed, the delay having arisen partly from certain privileges granted the Washington Terminal Co. to pass through square 690 by means of a subsurface railway tunnel, and it was deemed inadvisable to fully complete the building until the settlement of the earth over the tunnel and near the building had finally ceased.

The building has what one of our American humorists described as a Queen Ann front and Mary Ann rear. The wooden approach and steps on Delaware Avenue are not only unsightly but dangerous. The personnel of the commission has disappeared save the Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN, Senator from North Carolina. The Chair renews the commission by the appointment of the Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN, Senator from Wyoming, and the Hon. PHILANDER C. KNOX, Senator from Pennsylvania, and makes the modest request that the commission take up at least the question of finishing the Delaware Avenue entrance with Mr. Elliott Woods, Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds and superintendent of the construction of said building.

UNUSED LANDS FOR SOLDIERS (H. DOC. NO. 173).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting evidence that soldiers, sailors, and marines in the war with Germany are interested in the plan of Congress for providing them with farms upon the unused lands of the country, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting a list of useless papers on the files of the Interior Department devoid of historic interest and requesting action looking to their disposition. The communication and accompanying paper will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 2594. An act to extend the time for the construction of the Broadway Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.; and

S. 2595. An act to extend the time for the construction of the Main Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 6323. An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes;

H. R. 7478. An act to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918; and

H. J. Res. 150. Joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on certain mining claims during the year 1919.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 180. An act to incorporate Near East Relief;

S. 1361. An act further extending the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by an act entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges or viaducts across the waters between the mainland at or near Cedar Point and Dauphin Islands, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands," approved June 18, 1912, as extended by an act approved June 30, 1916; and

S. 1378. An act to authorize the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey to construct a bridge across the navigable waters of the Newark Bay, in the State of New Jersey.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from sundry citizens of Casper, Wyo., praying for the repeal of the so-called amusement tax, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Hardwick, Vt., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PHELAN presented petitions of Plumbers' Local Union No. 262, of Hanford; of Cooks and Waiters' Local Union No. 673, of San Bernardino; of Eola Rebekah Lodge, No. 256, of Igo; and of the Board of Supervisors of Alameda County, all in the State of California, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of sundry citizens of South Bend, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent experiments upon living dogs in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota presented a petition of sundry citizens of Flandreau, S. Dak., praying for the repeal of the tax on ice cream, soda, soft drinks, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

OCCUPATION OF THE RHINE PROVINCES.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have here a declaration by the United States of America, Great Britain, and France in regard to the occupation of the Rhine Provinces. It has been presented to Parliament and is for sale in London. It is dated the 16th of June. I dare say it has been printed in the press already, but if so it has escaped me. I am quite sure that it has not been presented to the Senate. I send it to the desk and ask that it may be read, so that it will go into the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DECLARATION BY THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, GREAT BRITAIN, AND FRANCE IN REGARD TO THE OCCUPATION OF THE RHINE PROVINCES.

Presented to Parliament by command of His Majesty.

DECLARATION BY THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, GREAT BRITAIN, AND FRANCE IN REGARD TO THE OCCUPATION OF THE RHINE PROVINCES.

The allied and associated powers did not insist on making the period of occupation last until the reparation clauses were completely executed, because they assumed that Germany would be obliged to give every proof of her good will and every necessary guarantee before the end of the 15 years' time.

As the cost of occupation involves an equivalent reduction of the amount available for reparations, the allied and associated powers stipulated, by article 431 of the treaty, that if before the end of the 15 years' period Germany had fulfilled all her obligations under the treaty the troops of occupation should be immediately withdrawn.

If Germany at an earlier date has given proofs of her good will and satisfactory guarantees to assure the fulfillment of her obligations, the allied and associated powers concerned will be ready to come to an agreement between themselves for the earlier termination of the period of occupation.

Now and henceforward, in order to alleviate the burden of the reparations bill, they agree that as soon as the allied and associated powers concerned are convinced that the conditions of disarmament by Germany are being satisfactorily fulfilled, the annual amount of the sums to be paid by Germany to cover the cost of occupation shall not exceed 240,000,000 marks (gold). This provision can be modified if the allied and associated powers agree as to the necessity of such modification.

TREATY WITH POLAND (S. DOC. NO. 65).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I also have here a treaty of peace between the United States of America and the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan on the one part and Poland on the other, signed at Versailles on the 28th of June. It was presented to Parliament some two weeks ago and is for sale in London. It has therefore been made public. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and also as a document for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The treaty is as follows:

TREATY OF PEACE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, THE BRITISH EMPIRE, FRANCE, ITALY, AND JAPAN AND POLAND.

[Treaty Series No. 8 (1919).]

"SIR: On behalf of the Supreme Council of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, I have the honour to communicate to you herewith in its final form the text of the Treaty which, in accordance with Article 93 of the Treaty of Peace with Germany, Poland will be asked to sign on the occasion of the confirmation of her recognition as an independent State and of the transference to her of the territories included in the former German Empire which are assigned to her by the said Treaty. The principal provisions were communicated to the Polish Delegation in Paris in May last, and were subsequently communicated direct to the Polish Government through the French Minister at Warsaw. The Council have since had the advantage of the suggestions which you were good enough to convey to them in your memorandum of the 16th June, and as the result of a study of these suggestions modifications have been introduced in the text of the Treaty. The Council believe that it will be found that by these modifications the principal points to which attention was drawn in your memorandum have, in so far as they relate to specific provisions of the Treaty, been adequately covered.

"In formally communicating to you the final decision of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in this matter, I should desire to take this opportunity of explaining in a more formal manner than has hitherto been done the considerations by which the Principal Allied and Associated Powers have been guided in dealing with the question.

"1. In the first place, I would point out that this Treaty does not constitute any fresh departure. It has for long been the established procedure of the public law of Europe that when a State is created, or even when large accessions of territory are made to an established State, the joint and formal recognition by the Great Powers should be accompanied by the requirement that such State should, in the form of a binding international convention, undertake to comply with certain principles of government. This principle, for which there are numerous other precedents, received the most explicit sanction when, at the last great assembly of European Powers—the Congress of Berlin—the sovereignty and independence of Serbia, Montenegro, and Roumania were recognised. It is desirable to recall the words used on this occasion by the British, French, Italian, and German Plenipotentiaries, as recorded in the Protocol of the 28th June, 1878:

"Lord Salisbury recognises the independence of Serbia, but is of opinion that it would be desirable to stipulate in the Principality the great principle of religious liberty.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. Waddington believes that it is important to take advantage of this solemn opportunity to cause the principles of religious liberty to be affirmed by the representatives of Europe. His Excellency adds that Serbia, who claims to enter the European family on the same basis as other States, must previously recognise the principles which are the basis of social organisation in all States of Europe and accept them as a necessary condition of the favour which she asks for.

* * * * * * *

"Prince Bismarck, associating himself with the French proposal, declares that the assent of Germany is always assured to any motion favourable to religious liberty.

"Count de Launay says that, in the name of Italy, he desires to adhere to the principle of religious liberty, which forms one of the essential bases of the institutions in his country, and that he associates himself with the declarations made on this subject by Germany, France, and Great Britain.

"Count Andrassy expresses himself to the same effect, and the Ottoman Plenipotentiaries raise no objection.

"Prince Bismarck, after having summed up the results of the vote, declares that Germany admits the independence of Serbia, but on condition that religious liberty will be recognised in the Principality. His Serene Highness adds that the Drafting Committee, when they formulate this decision, will affirm the connection established by the Conference between the proclamation of Serbian independence and the recognition of religious liberty.

"2. The Principal Allied and Associated Powers are of opinion that they would be false to the responsibility which rests upon them if on this occasion they departed from what has become an established tradition. In this connection I must also recall to your consideration the fact that it is to the endeavours and sacrifices of the Powers in whose name I am addressing you that the Polish nation owes the recovery of its independence. It is by their decision that Polish sovereignty is being re-established over the territories in question and that the inhabitants of these territories are being incorporated in the Polish nation. It is on the support which the resources of these Powers will afford to the League of Nations that for the future Poland will to a large extent depend for the secure possession of these territories. There rests, therefore, upon these Powers an obligation, which they cannot evade, to secure in the most permanent and solemn form guarantees for certain essential rights which will afford to the inhabitants the necessary protection whatever changes may take place in the internal constitution of the Polish State.

"It is in accordance with this obligation that Clause 93 was inserted in the Treaty of Peace with Germany. This clause relates only to Poland, but a similar clause applies the same principles to Czecho-Slovakia, and other clauses have been inserted in the Treaty of Peace with Austria and will be inserted in those with Hungary and with Bulgaria, under which similar obligations will be undertaken by other States, which under those Treaties receive large accessions of territory.

"The consideration of these facts will be sufficient to show that by the requirement addressed to Poland at the time when it receives in the most solemn manner the joint recognition of the re-establishment of its sovereignty and independence and when large accessions of territory are being assigned to it, no doubt is thrown upon the sincerity of the desire of the Polish Government and the Polish nation to maintain the general principles of justice and liberty. Any such doubt would be far from the intention of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

"3. It is indeed true that the new Treaty differs in form from earlier Conventions dealing with similar matters. The change of form is a necessary consequence and an essential part of the new system of international relations which is now being built up by the establishment of the League of Nations. Under the older system the guarantee for the execution of similar provisions was vested in the Great Powers. Experience has shown that this was in practice ineffective, and it was also open to the criticism that it might give to the Great Powers, either individually or in combination, a right to interfere in the internal constitution of the States affected which could be used for political purposes. Under the new system the guarantee is entrusted to the League of Nations. The clauses dealing with this guarantee have been carefully drafted so as to make it clear that Poland will not be in any way under the tutelage of those Powers who are signatories to the Treaty.

"I should desire, moreover, to point out to you that provision has been inserted in the Treaty by which disputes arising out of its provisions may be brought before the Court of the League of Nations. In this way differences which might arise will be removed from the political sphere and placed in the hands of a judicial court, and it is hoped that thereby an impartial decision will be facilitated, while at the same time any danger of political interference by the Powers in the internal affairs of Poland will be avoided.

"4. The particular provisions to which Poland and the other States will be asked to adhere differ to some extent from those which were imposed on the new States at the Congress of Berlin. But the obligations imposed upon new States seeking recognition have at all times varied with the particular circumstances. The Kingdom of the United Netherlands in 1814 formally undertook precise obligation with regard to the Belgian provinces at that time annexed to the kingdom which formed an important restriction on the unlimited exercise of its sovereignty. It was determined at the establishment of the Kingdom of Greece that the Government of that State should take a particular form, viz., it should be both monarchical and constitutional; when Thessaly was annexed to Greece, it was stipulated that the lives, property, honour, religion and customs of those of the inhabitants of the localities ceded to Greece, who remained under the Hellenic administration should be scrupulously respected, and that they should enjoy exactly the same civil and political rights as Hellenic subjects of origin. In addition, very precise stipulations were inserted safeguarding the interests of the Mohammedan population of these territories.

"The situation with which the Powers have now to deal is new, and experience has shown that new provisions are necessary. The territories now being transferred both to Poland and to other States inevitably include a large population speaking languages and belonging to races different from that of the people with whom they will be incorporated. Unfortunately, the races have been estranged by long years of bitter hostility. It is believed that these populations will be more easily reconciled to their new position if they know that from the very beginning they have assured protection and adequate guarantees against any danger of unjust treatment or oppression. The very knowledge that these guarantees exist will, it is hoped, materially help the reconciliation which all desire, and will indeed do much to prevent the necessity of its enforcement.

"5. To turn to the individual clauses of the present Treaty. Article 2 guarantees to all inhabitants those elementary rights, which are, as a matter of fact, secured in every civilised State. Clauses 3 to 6 are designed to insure that all the genuine residents in the territories now transferred to Polish sovereignty shall in fact be assured of the full privileges of citizenship. Articles 7 and 8, which are in accordance with precedent, provide against any discrimination against those Polish citizens who by their religion, their language, or their race, differ from the large mass of the Polish population. It is understood that, far from raising any objection to the matter of these articles, the Polish Government have already, of their own accord, declared their firm intention of basing their institutions on the cardinal principles enunciated therein.

"The following articles are of rather a different nature in that they provide more special privileges to certain groups of these minorities. In the final revision of these latter articles, the Powers have been impressed by the suggestions made in your memorandum of the 16th June, and the articles have in consequence been subjected to some material modifications. In the final text of the Treaty it has been made clear that the special privileges accorded in Article 9 are extended to Polish citizens of German speech only in such parts of Poland as are, by the Treaty with Germany, transferred from Germany to Poland. Germans in other parts of Poland will be unable under this article to claim to avail themselves of these privileges. They will therefore in this matter be dependent solely on the generosity of the Polish Government, and will in fact be in the same position as German citizens of Polish speech in Germany.

"6. Clauses 10 and 12 deal specifically with the Jewish citizens of Poland. The information at the disposal of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers as to the existing relations between the Jews and the other Polish citizens has led them to the conclusion that, in view of the historical development of the Jewish question and the great animosity aroused by it, special protection is necessary for the Jews in Poland. These clauses have been limited to the minimum which seems necessary under the circumstances of the present day, viz., the maintenance of Jewish schools and the protection of the Jews in the religious observance of their Sabbath. It is believed that these stipulations will not create any obstacle to the political unity of Poland. They do not constitute any recognition of the Jews as a separate political community within the Polish State. The educational provisions contain nothing beyond what is in fact provided in the educational institutions of many highly organised modern States. There is nothing inconsistent with the sovereignty of the State in recognising and supporting schools in which children shall be brought up in the religious influences to which they are accustomed in their home. Ample safeguards against any use of non-Polish languages to encourage a spirit of national separation have been provided in the express acknowledgment that the provisions of this Treaty do not prevent the Polish State from making the Polish language obligatory in all its schools and educational institutions.

"7. The economic clauses contained in Chapter II of the Treaty have been drafted with the view of facilitating the establishment of equitable commercial relations between independent Poland and the other Allied and Associated Powers. They include provisions for reciprocal diplomatic and consular representation, for freedom of transit, and for the adhesion of the Polish Government to certain international conventions.

"In these clauses the Principal Allied and Associated Powers have not been actuated by any desire to secure for themselves special commercial advantages. It will be observed that the rights accorded to them by these clauses are extended equally to all States who are members of the League of Nations. Some of the provisions are of a transitional character, and have been introduced only with the necessary object of bridging over the short interval which must elapse before general regulations can be established by Poland hereself or my commercial treaties or general conventions approved by the League of Nations.

"In conclusion, I am to express to you on behalf of the Allied and Associated Powers the very sincere satisfaction which they feel at the re-establishment of Poland as an independent State. They cordially welcome the Polish nation on its re-entry into the family of nations. They recall the great services which the ancient Kingdom of Poland rendered to Europe both in public affairs and by its contributions to the progress of mankind which is the common work of all civilised nations. They believe that the voice of Poland will add to the wisdom of their common deliberations in the cause of peace and harmony, that its influence will be used to further the spirit of liberty and justice, both in internal and external affairs, and that thereby it will help in the work of reconciliation between the nations which, with the conclusion of Peace, will be the common task of humanity.

"The treaty by which Poland solemnly declares before the world her determination to maintain the principles of justice, liberty, and toleration, which were the guiding spirit of the ancient Kingdom of Poland, and also receives in its most explicit and binding form the confirmation of her restoration to the family of independent nations, will be signed by Poland and by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers on the occasion of, and at the same time as, the signature of the Treaty of Peace with Germany.

"I have, &c. "CLEMENCEAU."

"The United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy and Japan, the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, on the one hand; and Poland on the other hand;

"Whereas the Allied and Associated Powers have by the success of their arms restored to the Polish nation the independence of which it had been unjustly deprived; and

"Whereas by the proclamation of March 30, 1917, the Government of Russia assented to the re-establishment of an independent Polish State; and

"Whereas the Polish State, which now in fact exercises sovereignty over those portions of the former Russian Empire which are inhabited by a majority of Poles, has already been recognized as a sovereign and independent State by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers; and

"Whereas under the Treaty of Peace concluded with Germany by the Allied and Associated Powers, a Treaty of which Poland is a signatory, certain portions of the former German Empire will be incorporated in the territory of Poland; and

"Whereas under the terms of the said Treaty of Peace, the boundaries of Poland not already laid down are to be subsequently determined by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers;

"The United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy and Japan, on the one hand, confirming their recognition of the Polish State, constituted within the said limits as a sovereign and independent member of the Family of Nations, and being anxious to ensure the execution of the provisions of Article 93 of the said Treaty of Peace with Germany;

"Poland, on the other hand, desiring to conform her institutions to the principles of liberty and justice, and to give a sure guarantee to the inhabitants of the territory over which she has assumed sovereignty;

"Mr. Roman Dmowski, President of the Polish National Committee;

"After having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

"CHAPTER I.

"ARTICLE 1.

"Poland undertakes that the stipulations contained in Articles 2 to 8 of this Chapter shall be recognised as fundamental laws, and that no law, regulation or official action shall conflict or interfere with the stipulations, nor shall any law, regulation or official action prevail over them.

"ARTICLE 2.

"Poland undertakes to assure full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Poland without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race or religion.

"All inhabitants of Poland shall be entitled to the free exercise, whether public or private, of any creed, religion or belief, whose practices are not inconsistent with public order or public morals.

"ARTICLE 3.

"Poland admits and declares to be Polish nationals ipso facto and without the requirement of any formality German, Austrian, Hungarian or Russian nationals habitually resident at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty in territory which is or may be recognized as forming part of Poland, but subject to any provisions in the Treaties of Peace with Germany or Austria respectively relating to persons who became resident in such territory after a specified date.

"Nevertheless, the persons referred to above who are over eighteen years of age will be entitled under the conditions contained in the said Treaties to opt for any other nationality which may be open to them. Option by a husband will cover his wife and option by parents will cover their children under eighteen years of age.

"Persons who have exercised the above right to opt must, except where it is otherwise provided in the Treaty of Peace with Germany, transfer within the succeeding twelve months their place of residence to the State for which they have opted. They will be entitled to retain their immovable property in Polish territory. They may carry with them their movable property of every description. No export duties may be imposed upon them in connection with the removal of such property.

"ARTICLE 4.

"Poland admits and declares to be Polish nationals ipso facto and without the requirement of any formality persons of German, Austrian, Hungarian or Russian nationality who were born in the said territory of parents habitually resident there, even if at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty they are not themselves habitually resident there.

"Nevertheless, within two years after the coming into force of the present Treaty, these persons may make a declaration before the competent Polish authorities in the country in which they are resident, stating that they abandon Polish nationality, and they will then cease to be considered as Polish nationals. In this connection a declaration by a husband will cover his wife, and a declaration by parents will cover their children under eighteen years of age.

"ARTICLE 5.

"Poland undertakes to put no hindrance in the way of the exercise of the right which the persons concerned have, under the Treaties concluded or to be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers with Germany, Austria, Hungary or Russia, to choose whether or not they will acquire Polish nationality.

"ARTICLE 6.

"All persons born in Polish territory who are not born nationals of another State shall ipso facto become Polish nationals.

"ARTICLE 7.

"All Polish nationals shall be equal before the law and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights without distinction as to race, language or religion.

"Differences of religion, creed or confession shall not prejudice any Polish national in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil or political rights, as for instance admission to public employments, functions and honours, or the exercise of professions and industries.

"No restriction shall be imposed on the free use by any Polish national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, in religion, in the press or in publications of any kind, or at public meetings.

"Notwithstanding any establishment by the Polish Government of an official language, adequate facilities shall be given to Polish nationals of non-Polish speech for the use of their language, either orally or in writing, before the courts.

"ARTICLE 8.

"Polish nationals who belong to racial, religious or linguistic minorities shall enjoy the same treatment and security in law and in fact as the other Polish nationals. In particular they shall have an equal right to establish, manage and control at their own expense charitable, religious and social institutions, schools and other educational establishments, with the right to use their own language and to exercise their religion freely therein.

"ARTICLE 9.

"Poland will provide in the public educational system in towns and districts in which a considerable proportion of Polish nationals of other than Polish speech are residents adequate facilities for ensuring that in the primary schools the instruction shall be given to the children of such Polish nationals through the medium of their own language. This provision shall not prevent the Polish Government from making the teaching of the Polish language obligatoory in the said schools.

"In towns and districts where there is a considerable proportion of Polish nationals belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, these minorities shall be assured an equtable share in the enjoyment and application of the sums which may be provided out of public funds under the State, municipal or other budget, for educational, religious or charitable purposes.

"The provisions of this Article shall apply to Polish citizens of German speech only in that part of Poland which was German territory on August 1, 1914.

"ARTICLE 10.

"Educational committees appointed locally by the Jewish communities of Poland will, subject to the general control of the State, provide for the distribution of the proportional share of public funds allocated to Jewish schools in accordance with Article 9, and for the organisation and management of these schools.

"The provisions of Article 9 concerning the use of languages in schools shall apply to these schools.

"ARTICLE 11.

"Jews shall not be compelled to perform any act which constitutes a violation of their Sabbath, nor shall they be placed under any disability by reason of their refusal to attend courts of law or to perform any legal business on their Sabbath. This provision however shall not exempt Jews from such obligations as shall be imposed upon all other Polish citizens for the necessary purposes of military service, national defence or the preservation of public order.

"Poland declares her intention to refrain from ordering or permitting elections, whether general or local, to be held on a Saturday, nor will registration for electoral or other purposes be compelled to be performed on a Saturday.

"ARTICLE 12.

"Poland agrees that the stipulations in the foregoing Articles, so far as they affect persons belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, constitute obligations of international concern and shall be placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations. They shall not be modified without the assent of a majority of the Council of the League of Nations. The United States, the British Empire, France, Italy and Japan hereby agree not to withhold their assent from any modification in these Articles which is in due form assented to by a majority of the Council of the League of Nations.

"Poland agrees that any Member of the Council of the League of Nations shall have the right to bring to the attention of the Council any infraction, or any danger of infraction, of any of these obligations, and that the Council may thereupon take such action and give such direction as it may deem proper and effective in the circumstances.

"Poland further agrees that any difference of opinion as to questions of law or fact arising out of these articles between the Polish Government and any one of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers or any other Power, a Member of the Council of the League of Nations, shall be held to be a dispute of an international character under Article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. The Polish Government hereby consents that any such dispute shall, if the other party thereto demands, be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice. The decision of the Permanent Court shall be final and shall have the same force and effect as an award under Article 13 of the Covenant.

"CHAPTER II.

"ARTICLE 13.

"Each of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers on the one part and Poland on the other shall be at liberty to appoint diplomatic representatives to reside in their respective capitals, as well as Consuls-General, Consuls, Vice-Consuls, and Consular agents to reside in the towns and ports of their respective territories.

"Consuls-General, Consuls, Vice-Consuls and Consular agents, however, shall not enter upon their duties until they have been admitted in the usual manner by the Government in the territory of which they are stationed.

"Consuls-General, Consuls, Vice-Consuls and Consular agents shall enjoy all the facilities, privileges, exemptions and immunities of every kind which are or shall be granted to consular officers of the most favoured nation.

"ARTICLE 14.

"Pending the establishment of an import tariff by the Polish Government, goods originating in the Allied and Associated States shall not be subject to any higher duties on importation into Poland than the most favourable rates of duty applicable to goods of the same kind under either the German, Austro-Hungarian or Russian Customs Tariffs on July 1, 1914.

"ARTICLE 15.

"Poland undertakes to make no treaty, convention or arrangement and to take no other action which will prevent her from joining in any general agreement for the equitable treatment of the commerce of other States that may be concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations within five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"Poland also undertakes to extend to all the Allied and Associated States any favours or privileges in customs matters which she may grant during the same period of five years to any State with which since August, 1914, the Allies have been at war, or to any State which may have concluded with Austria special customs arrangements as provided for in the Treaty of Peace to be concluded with Austria.

"ARTICLE 16.

"Pending the conclusion of the general agreement referred to above, Poland undertakes to treat on the same footing as national vessels or vessels of the most favoured nation the vessels of all the Allied and Associated States which accord similar treatment to Polish vessels.

"By way of exception from this provision, the right of Poland or of any other Allied or Associated State to confine her maritime coasting trade to national vessels is expressly reserved.

"ARTICLE 17.

"Pending the conclusion under the auspices of the League of Nations of a general Convention to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit, Poland undertakes to accord freedom of transit to persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails in transit to or from any Allied or Associated State over Polish territory, including territorial waters, and to treat them at least as favourably as the persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails respectively of Polish or of any other more favoured nationality, origin, importation or ownership, as regards facilities, charges, restrictions, and all other matters.

"All charges imposed in Poland on such traffic in transit shall be reasonable having regard to the conditions of the traffic. Goods in transit shall be exempt from all customs or other duties. Tariffs for transit traffic across Poland and tariffs between Poland and any Allied or Associated Power involving through tickets or waybills shall be established at the request of that Allied or Associated Power.

"Freedom of transit will extend to postal, telegraphic and telephonic services.

"It is agreed that no Allied or Associated Power can claim the benefit of these provisions on behalf of any part of its territory in which reciprocal treatment is not accorded in respect of the same subject matter.

"If within a period of five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty no general Convention as aforesaid shall have been concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations, Poland shall be at liberty at any time thereafter to give twelve months notice to the Secretary General of the League of Nations to terminate the obligations of this Article.

"ARTICLE 18.

"Pending the conclusion of a general Convention on the International Régime of waterways, Poland undertakes to apply to the river system of the Vistula (including the Bug and the Narev) the régime applicable to International Waterways set out in Articles 332 to 337 of the Treaty of Peace with Germany.

"ARTICLE 19.

"Poland undertakes to adhere within twelve months of the coming into force of the present treaty to the International Conventions specified in Annex I.

"Poland undertakes to adhere to any new convention, concluded with the approval of the Council of the League of Nations within five years of the coming into force of the present Treaty, to replace any of the International instruments specified in Annex I.

"The Polish Government undertakes within twelve months to notify the Secretary General of the League of Nations whether or not Poland desires to adhere to either or both of the International Conventions specified in Annex II.

"Until Poland has adhered to the two Conventions last specified in Annex I, she agrees, on condition of reciprocity, to protect by effective measures the industrial, literary and artistic property of nationals of the Allied and Associated States. In the case of any Allied or Associated State not adhering to the said Conventions Poland agrees to continue to afford such effective protection on the same conditions until the conclusion of a special bi-lateral treaty or agreement for that purpose with such Allied or Associated State.

"Pending her adhesion to the other Conventions specified in Annex I, Poland will secure to the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers the advantages to which they would be entitled under the said Conventions.

"Poland further agrees, on condition of reciprocity, to recognise and protect all rights in any industrial, literary or artistic property belonging to the nationals of the Allied and Associated States in force, or which but for the war would have been in force, in any part of her territories before transfer to Poland. For such purpose she will accord the extensions of time agreed to in Articles 307 and 308 of the Treaty with Germany.

"ARTICLE 20.

"All rights and privileges accorded by the foregoing Articles to the Allied and Associated States shall be accorded equally to all States members of the League of Nations.

"ARTICLE 21.

"Poland agrees to assume responsibility for such proportion of the Russian public debt and other Russian public liabilities of any kind as may be assigned to her under a special convention between the Principal Allied and Associated Powers on the one hand and Poland on the other, to be prepared by a Commission appointed by the above States. In the event of the Commission not arriving at an agreement the point at issue shall be referred for immediate arbitration to the League of Nations.

"The present Treaty, of which the French and English texts are both authentic, shall be ratified. It shall come into force at the same time as the Treaty of Peace with Germany.

"The deposit of ratifications shall be made at Paris.

"Powers of which the seat of the Government is outside Europe will be entitled merely to inform the Government of the French Republic through their diplomatic representative at Paris that their ratification has been given; in that case they must transmit the instrument of ratification as soon as possible.

"A procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up.

"The French Government will transmit to all the signatory Powers a certified copy of the procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications.

"In faith whereof the above-named Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty.

"Done at Versailles, the twenty-eighth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, in a single copy which will remain deposited in the archives of the French Republic, and of which authenticated copies will be transmitted to each of the Signatory Powers."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 77) to amend section 18 of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1919, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 130) thereon.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 667) limiting the creation or extension of forest reserves in New Mexico, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 131) thereon.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2446) to amend section 1318, Revised Statutes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2623) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide quarters or commutation thereof to commissioned officers in certain cases," approved April 16, 1918 (Rept. No. 133); and

A bill (S. 2624) to provide travel allowances for certain retired enlisted men and Regular Army reservists (Rept. No. 134).

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2676) to amend section 56 of an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916 (Rept. No. 135); and

A bill (S. 2677) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade and technical schools and universities, other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 136).

LOCAL DRAFT BOARDS.

Mr. HARDING. On the 21st ultimo I introduced the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 73) providing for payment of compensation for services of members of local draft boards who served also as clerks of their respective boards, and it was inadvertently referred to the Committee on Claims. I ask that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

MILITARY JUSTICE.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 146), and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "Military Justice" by Lieut. Col. S. T. Ansell, delivered on June 26, 1919, at Bedford Springs, Pa., before the Pennsylvania Bar Association, be printed in the RECORD.

The manuscript is as follows:

[Delivered by Lieut. Col. S. T. Ansell on June 26, 1919, at Bedford Springs, Pa., before the Pennsylvania Bar Association.]

"MILITARY JUSTICE.

"I.

"One view:

"The army is the army of the King, to be disciplined by him and his commanders under his ordinances and at his pleasure. (Recital of the ordinances of Richard II.)

"And another view:

"Congress shall have (the exclusive) power to raise and support armies; Congress shall have (the exclusive) power to make rules for the regulation and government of the land and naval forces. (The Constitution of the United States.)

"Among the nations of the world there are two diametrically opposite theories as to the place that the army shall occupy as an institution of government. Those theories are well illustrated by the two texts quoted at the beginning of this discussion. The one clearly represents the monarchical, reactionary, and personal government view. The other is a necessary part of that larger theory of government which insists that the source of all political power is to be found in the people. Under the one theory the army is an army of a king or emperor or person in authority; under the other it is an institution ordained by the people to do their service. Under the one, the obligation of the soldier is to a military chieftain; under the other, it is to the State. Under the one, the military relationship is governed by considerations of personal loyalty and fealty to those in authority; under the other, the military obligation and all relations inter sese are established and governed by law established, not intra-institutionally but by the people themselves. Under the one theory the army has a detached, independent, and self-sufficient existence, finding within itself the source of its own government; under the other it is but an institution of government, drawing, like all other institutions, its power from a common superior source upon which it depends for its government and its very existence. Under the one the common soldier was but a serf, a personal retainer of the King, or a subordinate commander, and under the other he is a citizen serving the State in the highest capacity of citizenship.

"That the army belonged to the King rather than to the people was a doctrine maintained in England from earliest times, and which has only been modified with, and rather less slowly than, the progressive growth of popular government. Even at the time of our separation such was the constitutional theory. The right of control by Parliament was practical rather than legalistic. Such organic relations, once established, do not soon or easily disappear. They still persist in and pervade the military code of England; and, notwithstanding the provisions of our fundamental law, relics of the same organic relation strangely persist in our own military code even more strongly than in England's.

"At the time of our separation the respective spheres of power of Parliament and the King over the army had not been definitely determined, but, on the other hand, were a matter of grave and serious contention; indeed, they have not been determined to this day. A matter of such tremendous import to their liberties as the question of the control of the Army, the fathers of our Government were not disposed to leave unsettled. As they did not intend that our people should inherit this controversy regarding the control of the armed forces, they did not intend that the Chief Executive of this Nation should inherit those military powers which in the motherland had been deemed inherent in the Crown. They resolved to make it certain that the Army of the United States should be called into being only by Congress, should continue to exist only at the will of Congress, and should be governed and disciplined only in accordance with laws enacted by Congress. Thus it was that the Constitution, while conferring upon the Chief Executive the power of command, expressly and exclusively conferred upon Congress the power to raise and support armies and the power to make rules for their regulation and government.

"It is under this latter power that Congress enacts the code for the discipline of the Army, commonly known as the Articles of War. The power to make rules for the regulation and government of the armed forces is the power to prescribe the relations, the powers, and the rules of conduct for all the members of those forces, both officers and men, and provide sufficient sanction. It has power to prescribe the substantive offense, the penalty, the tribunal, and the methods of procedure and trial, all subject, of course, to the limitations upon the legislative power found elsewhere in the Constitution. Accordingly, it has the sole power to enact a penal code for the complete government of all who occupy the military status. A soldier is also a citizen, and his conduct must conform not only to the requirements of the general law of the land but to the special requirements of the Military Establishment. The military code is comprehensive of both relations. It adopts the substantive provisions of general social law, and it denounces and penalizes the myriad manifestations of misconduct prejudicial to the military obligation.

"Such exercise of penal power should be in keeping with the progress of enlightened government and should not be inconsistent with those fundamental principles of law which have ever characterized Anglo-American jurisprudence. The military code, being a penal code, it should see that it can be applied to none except upon probable cause. It should be specific with respect to the definition of the offense denounced and the penalty provided. It should particularize with respect to matters of procedure that the trial may be full, fair, and impartial. It should require recognition of those rules of evidence which our jurisprudence has evolved as necessary to elicit those facts upon which the ultimate conclusion of guilt or innocence may with safety and justice rest. With the utmost care it should guarantee those safeguards and that protection for an accused whose life and liberty are placed in jeopardy, which are the pride of our enlightened civilization.

"None of these things does our code do. Its failure to do justice regulated by law should be patent to all who will but observe, and the reasons therefor should not, even to the meanest intellect, be obscure.

"II.

"One view:

"(a) There was extant, I observed, one system of articles of war which had carried two empires to the head of mankind, the Roman and the British, for the British articles of war are only a literal translation of the Roman. It would be vain for us to seek in our own invention or the records of warlike nations for a more complete system of military discipline. I was, therefore, for reporting the British articles of war totidem verbis. * * *. So undigested were the notions of liberty prevalent among the majority of the members most zealously attached to the public cause that to this day I scarcely know how it was possible that these articles could have been carried. They were adopted, however, and they have governed our armies with little variation to this day. (History of the adoption of the British articles of 1774 by the Continental Congress; Life and Works of John Adams, vol. 3, pp. 68–82.)

"(b) Our military code, however, stands alone among our public statutes in its retaining many provisions and forms of expression dating back from 200 to 500 years, and while it is desirable that some of the articles should be made more precise or extended in scope and the code itself simplified by dropping a few articles and consolidating others, any radical remodeling which would divest this time-honored body of law of its historical associations and interests would be greatly to be deprecated. (Winthrop's Law, Standard Military Text, vol. 1, p. 15.)

"And another:

"Our military code is the British code of 1774 practically unchanged; it has long since outlived its time and whatever usefulness it may have had; it is archaic and cruel; it is not worthy of the name either of law or justice. (Executive committee of the American Bar Association, February, 1919.)

"Our Articles of War, organically and for the most part in detail, are the British articles of 1774, which themselves are of more ancient origin. That this is true of the articles, certainly as they existed up to the 'revision of 1916,' all military authorities and military text writers, with the love that such have for ancient legal and literary lineage, have proudly declared. The various English codes since the articles of Richard II in 1385 will be found set out in such texts as Winthrop and Davis. A comparison of the several ancient British codes will show you that up until the middle of the last century the British military law changed none in system and principle and only slightly and slowly toward more liberal provisions. The code of 1774, the one we adopted, is buttressed in the principles of and adopts most of its provisions from its prototypes of centuries before. This was the code which our Continental Congress adopted at the beginning of the Revolution, and in principle and in most of its provisions it is the code which we have to this day, unless in truth it can be said that the so-called 'revision of 1916' wrought therein a substantial and systemic change. Legislative history records, as a moment of comparison will serve to verify, that our Continental Congress did, in 1775, adopt in their entirety the British articles of 1774. This Congress did rather inconsiderately to meet an emergent situation in the discipline of the Continental Army. John Adams, distinguished as a statesman and as a scholar rather than as one endowed with the keenest appreciations of democracy, put the British articles through. He himself, appreciating their rigorous character, did not expect them to pass without serious liberalization. He said:

"It was a very difficult and unpopular subject, and I observed to Jefferson that whatever alteration we should report with the least energy in it or the least tendency to a necessary discipline of the Army would be opposed with as much vehemence as if it were the most perfect; we might as well, therefore, report the complete system at once and let it meet its fate. Something perhaps might be gained.

"Writing in 1805 he expressed surprise that it was possible that these articles could have been carried.

"Of this adopted code, the Judge Advocate General, in his letter to the Secretary of War proposing the 'revision of 1916,' said:

"Passing over the earlier enactments of the American Colonies of the Articles of War for the government of their respective contingents, we come to the first American articles—the code of 1775—enacted by the Second Continental Congress June 30, 1775. Of this code, comprising 69 articles, the original was the existing British code of 1774, from which said articles were largely copied.

"There have been several so-called 'revisions' of this code of 1774—the 'revision' of 1775, the 'revision' of 1776, the 'code' of 1786 (which survived the Constitution and was kept in force by successive statutes until 1806), and the 'code' of 1806. The Judge Advocate General in illustrating the necessity for his revision of 1916 showed what is universally conceded that none of these really revised the old British code of 1774; that they made no change in substance, system, or principle, and but little in terms. Of these 'revisions,' doubtless the code of 1806 was the most important. Of this code, Winthrop, agreeing with the present Judge Advocate General and all the authorities, states, what a comparison will show to be true, that—

"It repeated the provision of 1786 in regard to courts-martial, with some slight modification consisting merely in extending the authority to convene general courts and in substituting the President for Congress in the cases in which the latter had previously been vested with final revisory authority.

"In a statement to the Military Committees the Judge Advocate General, on May 14, 1912, said that our code as it then existed 'was substantially the code of 1806.' He also showed that the code of 1806 was systematically the code of 1774, and, as just seen, he could have given an even more ancient lineage. Of this code of 1806 he said:

"The 1806 code was a reenactment of the articles in force during the Revolutionary War period, with only such modifications as were necessary to adapt them to the Constitution of the United States.

"He also said:

"We are governing the Army to-day under a rather ancient code, one which has many of the defects of a code that has been compiled rather than written.

And, furthermore, he said to the committees:

"It is to be doubted if the Congress has ever been called upon to amend legislation which is as archaic in its character as our present Articles of War.

"Speaking to his so-called 'revision' of 1916, the Judge Advocate General summed up as follows:

"It is thus accurate to say that during the long interval between 1806 and 1912—106 years—our military code has undergone no change except that which has been accomplished by piecemeal amendment. Of the 101 articles which made up the code of 1806, 87 survive in our present code unchanged, and most of the remainder without substantial change. Meanwhile the British code, from which, as we have seen, these articles were largely taken, has been, mainly through the medium of the army annual act, revised almost out of recognition, indicating that the Government with which it originated has recognized its inadaptability to modern service conditions.

"Now, was the Crowder revision of 1916 an organic revision? Did it change the system or the basic principles of the code as it then existed, which was known by all and declared by him to be medieval British code? If the Crowder revision made no such organic change, then we still have an archaic code.

"It made no such change. A comparison will demonstrate that it made no such change. Proponents of the 'revision' themselves stated that the revision requested was a verbal one. It was not intended or designed to make a single fundamental change. So the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General both frankly declared. Secretary Stimpson, in his letter of April 19, 1912, to the Committee on Military Affairs, in submitting the proposed revision, described the 'broad features of the project' as follows:

"1. The revision was undertaken in the conservative spirit that legislative reforms should be evolutionary. In other words, that which has successfully withstood the test of experience should be retained and changes and innovations should be limited to the wisdom of experience. As a matter of draftsmanship it has been sought to build upon established lines and to conform in general to settled administrative and judicial construction.

"2. The existing articles are notoriously unsystematic and unscientific. Inevitably this condition hampers their easy and effective enforcement. A careful classification has been made; disassociated legislation in the new Articles of War has been incorporated therein, resulting in an analytical, precise, comprehensive, and easily enforceable code.

"3. There is necessity for a new inferior court.

"The Judge Advocate General, in his letter submitting the project for revision, described the 'more important changes sought to be made' as those of 'arrangement and classification.' The revision of 1916 does nothing but assemble, classify, and render more convenient old articles, dresses them up in rather more modern language, writes into them what hitherto had been legally implied into them by construction, and makes not one single fundamental change. That this is so will become apparent upon a comparison of the 1916 revision with the law as it previously existed. Nobody, neither the Judge Advocate General, the Secretary of War, nor either of the committees of Congress, has ever regarded the project of 1916 as a real, substantial revision; indeed, the Judge Advocate General took occasion to deny that it was anything but a restatement of existing law for the sake of convenience and clarity. If you are interested in verifying this statement, you may do so by reference to the printed hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs upon the revision of the Articles of War in 1912, 1915, and 1916. You will find there that the author of the project, discussing it before the committees, article by article, was quick to assure them upon every occasion and with respect to every article having to do with military justice that the project made and contemplated no substantial change in the articles, which he truthfully traced to the British articles of 1774 and beyond. He himself said, at page 43 of these hearings:

"If Congress enacts this revision, the service will not be cognizant of any material changes in the procedure, and courts will function much the same as heretofore. * * * The revision will make certain a great deal that has been read into the existing code by construction.

"That was the truth. Nobody has experienced any change for the better.

"III.

"One view:

"(a) Courts-martial are not courts, but are, in fact, simply instrumentalities of the executive power provided by Congress for the President, as Commander in Chief, to aid him in properly commanding the Army and enforcing discipline therein, and utilized under his orders or those of his authorized military representative; they are, indeed, creatures of orders, and, except in so far as an independent discretion may be given them by statute, they are as much subject to the orders of a competent superior as is any military body of persons. (Winthrop's Law, Standard Military Text, vol. 1, p. 54.)

"(b) An army, to be successful in the field, must from the moment it begins to train at home have absolute control of its discipline. The commanding general is everything. He must bear the three keys. He must have final control. He must be the judiciary, the legislative, and the executive. If he were not he would not have an army. (News editorial read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 27, 1919, pp. 4507 and 4508, by Representative KAHN, chairman House Committee on Military Affairs, at the request of the Judge Advocate General of the Army.)

"(c) The fittest field for the complete application of military law is to be found in the camp. (Declaration by the Judge Advocate General of the Army in a report to the Secretary of War, resisting the view that judgments of court-martial should be subject to legal revision.)

"Another:

"The whole proceeding (the administration of military justice through courts-martial) from its inception is judicial. The trial, findings, and sentence are the solemn acts of a court organized and conducted under the authority of and according to the prescribed forms of law. It sits to pass upon the most sacred question of human rights that are ever placed on trial in a court of justice; rights which, in the very nature of things, can neither be exposed to danger nor subjected to the uncontrolled will of any man, but which must be adjudged according to law. (Supreme Court of the United States, in Runkel v. the United States, 122 U. S., p. 543.)

"It follows from what has been said, and it is true, that there are two diametrically opposed legal theories as to courts-martial. One is that a court-martial is an executive agency belonging to and under the control of the military commander; is, indeed, but a board of officers appointed to investigate the accusation and report their findings to the commander for his approval. Under such a theory a commander exercises an almost unrestrained and unlimited discretion in determining (1) who shall be tried, (2) the prima facie sufficiency of the proof, (3) the sufficiency of the charge, (4) the composition of the court, (5) all questions of law arising during the progress of the trial, (6) the correctness of the proceedings and their sufficiency in law and in fact. Under such a theory all these questions are controlled not by law but by the power of military command.

"The other theory is that a court-martial is inherently judicial, its functions from beginning to end are judicial, and are to be regulated and limited by established principles of jurisprudence which govern the exercise of judicial functions in our system.

"Obviously the first theory would better accord with those Governments which are classed as arbitrary, while the judicial theory is the one best adapted to our own liberal institutions. Yet the arbitrary system is the one that we have, an inheritance of reactionary days. It is a system which, while subjecting every man in the establishment to the direct penalties, even death, proceeds to do so without requiring or contemplating the participation of a single man of legal qualification at any phase of the trial, from the filing of the charges to the moment of execution. It is a system which proclaims itself man-governed rather than law-governed.

"It is not, however, the system which our fundamental law contemplated. Obviously our fathers contemplated one system of military justice and our first Congress enacted another, which we still have with us. This it did to meet an emergency. The emergency over, interest in the subject ceased. In time of war there is no opportunity to reform the system, and in time of peace nobody is interested in reforming it, which suggests a homely illustration. So it is that to this day we have foisted upon us a system of military justice that obtained in England in medieval times.

"That system is un-American. It came to us by inheritance and rather witless adoption out of a system of government, in which the King controlled the army and out of an age noted for its harshness to all alleged or suspected offenders and for the utter disregard of the rights of the common soldier. This system of military justice has in the meantime undergone no change to suit it to our conditions and is as far out of accord with the principles and policies of our Government and the views of our people as were the European systems of government of that day. The system is not only of British origin. It is itself British and the British of several centuries ago. It belongs to a land and an age in which the common soldier was but the personal retainer of the King and not a servant of the State.

"Britain would not recognize that code now. Quite as the Judge Advocate General said in his letter of April 12, transmitting his project for revision:

"Meanwhile the British code, from which, as we have seen, these articles were largely taken, has been, mainly through the medium of the army annual act, revised almost out of recognition, indicating that the Government with which the code originated has recognized its inadaptability to modern service conditions.

"While Great Britain has not done all in the way of liberalizing her military code that a liberty-loving race, though living under a monarchical form of government, might have been expected to do, she has done immeasurably more than we. We have done nothing. We have remained absolutely stagnant. The truth of the matter is that while the English-speaking races are the greatest lovers of civil liberty on earth, for various reasons they have had but little interest in their soldiery and the soldiers' welfare.

"When we separated from England the King was not only the commander of the Army, he was the legislator for the Army. He made the laws for its government; he prescribed the Articles of War, though Parliament contented itself with the view that he did so by reason of parliamentary grant; he prescribed the offenses and the penalty; he prescribed both the substantive and precedural law; he prescribed the courts-martial, their jurisdiction, and their procedure. He controlled the entire system of discipline and the methods of its administration. The army was the King's army, the officers were his officers and from him drew their authority. The men were the King's men, placed by the King under his officers and subjected to the personal authority of the King and officers. Courts-martial were courts-martial of the King and of the officers representing him and his power of command. The courts-martial, therefore, applied the King's law, the King's penalty, followed the King's procedure, and were subject to the King's command as delegated to an underofficer. Under such a scheme a court-martial was but an agency of command, nowhere in touch with the popular will, nowhere governed by laws established by the people to regulate the relation between sovereign and subject. It was not a judicial body. Its functions were not judicial functions. It was but an agency of the power of command to do its bidding.

"Such is the system we have with us to-day. It does not contemplate that a court-martial shall be a court doing justice according to established principles of jurisprudence and independently of all personal power; quite the contrary. It regards the court-martial simply as the right hand of the commanding officer, to aid him in the maintenance of discipline. It is his agent; he controls it. It is answerable not to the law but to him. Think of what that means. The court-martial is not a court at all; it is but an agency of military command governed and controlled by the will of the commander. Under such a system an officer belongs to a caste—is a thing apart. Any officer can prefer charges against a man and at his will can succeed in getting him tried. The statute requires no preliminary investigation to determine whether or not he may be tried, and such as is required by regulation is also controlled by the military commander and is neither thorough nor effective.

"From then on everything is governed not by law but by the power of military command. The detail of counsel, the membership of the court, the question of the validity of the charge, the sufficiency of the evidence, the correctness of the procedure, the validity of the judgment and sentence, and the thousand and one questions arising in the progress of a criminal trial are all left finally to the judgment of the commanding general. Even the ultimate conclusion of guilt or innocence is subject to his control. There is no right of review; there is no legal supervision. All is to be determined by the commanding general. Whatever he says is right and becomes right as his ipse dixit, regardless of general principles of jurisprudence, and right beyond any power of review. He is the law. No matter how great the departures are from the well-established principles of law and right and justice, these departures become error or not just as the commanding officer may choose to regard them. There is no legal standard to which courts-martial procedure must conform, and therefore there can be no error adjudged according to a legal standard. In other words, military justice is administered not according to a standard of law at all but under the authority of a commanding officer. The results are, as might be expected when one man is left to be judged at the will of another, the penalties and sentence are shockingly harsh; and I think that everybody, if everybody would speak frankly and helpfully, must be heartily ashamed of them.

"The Constitution contemplates that the administration of military justice should be governed in accordance with the laws of Congress and not in accordance with the will of any person; that Congress should define specifically the offense, definitely prescribe the punishment, establish the procedure, and keep all upon the fundamental principles of our jurisprudence. The highest tribunal of the land, whenever it has had occasion to speak, has accentuated the fact that courts-martial are inherently courts dealing with judicial functions of the most sacred character. Congress has utterly failed to legislate in furtherance of the constitutional and judicial theory, and by its failure to legislate and by its adoption and retention of a system emanating out of a different theory has left it so that military command may continue that medieval system of discipline which is governed not by law but by the will of the military commander.

"IV.

"One view:

"The introduction of fundamental principles of civil jurisprudence into the administration of military justice is to be discouraged and resisted. (The departmental view as expressed in the hearing (1912) on the bill to amend the Articles of War.)

"Another:

"A court-martial is a court deriving its authority from the United States. * * * Congress, by express constitutional provisions, has the power to prescribe rules for the government and regulation of the Army, but those rules must be interpreted in connection with the prohibition against a man's being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. The former provision must not be so interpreted as to nullify the latter. (Supreme Court of the United States, in Grafton v. The United States, 206 U. S., 333, 352.)

"This theory of control of courts-martial by the power of military command is, of course, in irreconcilable conflict with the view that trial by court-martial should conform to those fundamental principles of civil jurisprudence that are designed to secure for every accused a full, fair, and impartial trial. The militaristic view insists that trial shall be no more than a hearing by or for a commanding officer. The opposing view, which accords with our institutions and seems to be required by fundamental law, insists that the trial shall be in accordance with established principles of law, that discipline must be attained through and by law, and that discipline, both in the legal and moral sense of the term, can not exist except with and through justice. According to the former view courts-martial are not courts of law, independently administering the law and governed by the law, but are indeed above the law. They are of an unquestionable rectitude and quality, and their methods and judgments are not to be tested by the simple rules designed for the government of men in all social relations. Officers of the Army—at least unless once entangled in their toils—love to denominate them 'courts of honor,' functioning independently of the ordinary human rules and endowed with a refinement of judgment not recognized in other spheres of society. Being courts of honor and not of law, they need know no law, are presumed to know no law, and, as a rule, do know no law. Thus it is that these principles designed to secure a fair and impartial trial, which, having been evolved by our civilization, are at the basis of our Government and are written into our fundamental law, need not be observed by these courts. That a man shall not be tried except upon probable cause judicially determined; that he is entitled to a fair and impartial judge; that a judge may not sit in his own cause or be a prosecuting witness in the case before him; that the accused shall have the right to a judicial test of the validity of the accusation; that he shall be fully informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him; that he is entitled to the assistance of counsel; that he is entitled to witnesses in his own behalf and the right to confront the witnesses opposed to him; that he has the right fully to test by proper cross-examination any witness regardless of rank or other earthly circumstance; that he is entitled to a public hearing, and finally shall be accorded an opportunity to appeal for clemency—these matters, found essential to fairness in a court of law, are not recognized as necessary or advisable to be secured to an accused on trial before these 'courts of honor.'

"These distinguishing characteristics of the administration of civil justice must not, say military men, be introduced into the military code. The present Judge Advocate General of the Army in calling attention to these essential differences between military and civil justice quotes from Col. Burkeheimer, author of Military and Civil Law, as follows:

"The military code prescribed a rule of conduct to a body of men who consecrate their lives to the profession of arms. The camp is the fittest field of application. It may be very objectionable in some respects contemplated from the purely legal standpoint and yet be admirably adapted to the purposes of uniting, governing, and directing to a single object the armed forces of the United States.

"He further quoted from Judge Advocate General Lieber, who, writing in 1879, said:

"Military law is founded on the idea of a departure from civil law, and it seems to me a grave error to suffer it to become a sacrifice to principles of civil jurisprudence at variance with its object.

"He quotes also from Gen. Sherman, in which he said:

"It is greatly to be desired that the common law for the armies of the United States should be compiled not from the doctrines and experiences of civil lawyers but from the experience of the best ordered and best governed armies of Europe and America.

"And the same authority, pointing out that this essential difficulty between the military and civil criminal code, said that it was so because 'of the necessities of the military state and the especial purposes which any military code is intended to serve.'

"So say they all. The sacrifice of legal principles and of our sense of natural justice in the trial of military offenders is said to be necessary for the maintenance of discipline. It may well be that military punishments should be severe and certain and not long delayed, but such requirements do not serve to distinguish military from civil justice. A man should not be punished unless he is tried and tried fairly. Guilt must be established in accordance with legal principles before the penalty can be legally applied. To do otherwise is to resort to the methods of the mob. It is not necessary to do injustice in order to achieve discipline. Let us not forget the truth, as William Pitt said, that—

"Necessity is the argument of tyrants; it is the creed of slaves.

"Or, as expressed by Milton—

"And with necessity,
The tyrant's plea, excused his devilish deeds.

"Necessity can never be admitted as a proper basis for normal action.

"Under the military theory that a court-martial is not a court, that its functions are not judicial, and that it does not try crimes but simply mere breaches of the military obligation, it has been the long-standing view of the department, supported by the decisions of many of the lower Federal courts, that the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy and such like principles of the Bill of Rights had no application to these trials. Upon this theory an enlisted man tried and acquitted by court-martial in the Philippines of murder was subsequently subjected to trial for the same homicide before a civil court in that Federal jurisdiction. The civil court overruled the plea in bar of trial and its judgment upon conviction was sustained by the supreme court of the Philippines. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment, discharged the soldier from custody, and in doing so rendered an opinion which is of the greatest significance, though it seems to have fallen on deaf ears, so far as the War Department and Congress are concerned. The court pointed out that a court-martial is a court exercising judicial functions, as much so as any other court of the United States; and after having further pointed out that the civil court had tried the soldier for an offense of which he had been previously acquitted by a court of the United States having competent jurisdiction—the court-martial—the court said:

"It is attempted to meet this view by the suggestion that Grafton committed two distinct offenses—one against military law and discipline, the other against civil law, which may prescribe the punishment for crimes against organized society by whomsoever those crimes are committed—and that a trial for either offense, whatever its result, whether acquittal or conviction, and even if the first trial was in a court of competent jurisdiction, is no bar to a trial in another court of the same government for the same offense. We can not assent to this view.

"The court went on to say:

"Congress by express constitutional provision has the power to prescribe rules for the government and regulation of the Army, but those rules must be interpreted in connection with the prohibition against a man's being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. The former provision must not be so interpreted as to nullify the latter. If, therefore, a person be tried for an offense in a tribunal deriving its jurisdiction and authority from the United States and is acquitted or convicted, he can not again be tried for the same offense in another tribunal deriving its jurisdiction and authority from the United States.

"And then the court took occasion to state that it based its decision that the soldier was entitled to this protection not on the ground that an article of war provides against second trials nor that the organic act of the Philippines contained a similar provision but on the ground of constitutional requirement, saying:

"But we rest our decision of this question upon the broad ground that the same acts constituting a crime against the United States can not, after the acquittal or conviction of the accused in a court of competent jurisdiction, be made the basis of a second trial of the accused for that crime in the same or any other court, civil or military, of the same Government.

"Surely a court-martial may not perform its fundamental functions as a court of law without recognizing those principles of civil jurisprudence designed to secure a fair trial.

"V.

"One view:

"(a) The President may prescribe the procedure, including modes of proof, in cases before courts-martial. (New Articles of War (38th), which was enacted in 1916 upon the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General and the War Department and which abolished the rule requiring courts-martial to recognize the rules of evidence applied in the criminal courts of the United States.)

"(b) And why should not a soldier commit himself? The business of courts-martial is not to discuss law but to get at the truth by all the means in its power. We soldiers want to get at the fact, no matter how, for the sake of discipline, and I know of no better evidence against a man than himself. (Napier's Notes, Military Law, accepted and frequently quoted by officers of the United States Army.)

"Another:

"(a) Our rules of evidence are the safeguards of every subject of your Majesty, high and low, rich and poor, young and old. Were those rules to be disregarded, anybody might at any time be found guilty of anything. They ought, of all others, to be kept inviolate, for the whole administration of justice depends upon them. They are, as I have this day seen observed in full force and eloquence, the result of the collective wisdom of generations and founded on the principles of immutable equity. (Warren's Letter to the Queen on a Late Court-Martial (p. 8), which was instrumental in revolutionizing the British military code.)

"(b) It is one purpose of this bill to require that the question of guilt or innocence shall be determined only upon evidence admitted in accordance with the established rules as applied by the criminal courts of the United States; that is to say, the common-law rules of evidence as modified by Congress. (Statement of principles of the Chamberlain-Johnson bill to establish military justice.)

"The militaristic mind is intolerant of those methods and processes necessary to justice. Justice is not a thing which can be left to nature unnurtured by man. Frequently it must be achieved through pain and toil. It is a high object of government, and government is required for its establishment. When resort is had to a trial, justice can not be achieved unless the methods of the trial are themselves just. The procedure leading to the result and the result itself are essentially involved in justice, and if the procedure is wrong so must be the result. The one is no less important than the other. Neither the President nor any of his military minions should be permitted to prescribe those rules of procedure, including the rules of evidence, which govern the results in criminal prosecutions. To prescribe such procedure is not an executive function.

"But the revision of 1916 so made it. Three new articles affecting military justice were introduced by the revision, all of which were reactionary, still further subjecting judicial functions to military command. One of these (thirty-eighth) authorized the President to prescribe the procedure, including modes of proof, in cases before courts-martial. This was enacted at the request of the military authorities and in deference to the military view, which insists that military command should control the trial. It must also be remembered that while the statute in terms confers the power upon the President as an administrative fact, it is not the President who will exercise it, but the Chief of Staff and the Judge Advocate General of the Army—ultramilitary men.

"While the military mind is intolerant of all protective principles and of all rules governing a trial, it is particularly so of the rules of evidence. The text quoted from Napier is orthodox American military doctrine. With one accord the professional officers of our Army believe with Napier 'that the business of courts-martial is not to discuss law, but to get at the truth by all the means in its power.' Our officers, both in formal and in informal statements in support of our system of military justice, habitually drop into the very language used by that distinguished British officer when he took the British bar to task for its interference in court-martial matters, and boldly declared:

"We soldiers want to get at the fact, no matter how, for the sake of discipline.

"'There is no better witness against a man than himself.' That statement is axiomatic among our officers. They will hear of no qualifications, nor can they see any evil consequences of the generous application of what is so good. It is the basis of our third-degree methods. It helps the investigating officer to impose his authority upon the unfortunate suspected man and enmesh him in words and conduct having no origin in fairness and truth. It is an excuse for the reception of incompetent confessions or for holding them to be without prejudicial effect. It justifies in a thousand instances that situation in which an accused, with incompetent counsel or none, is induced to take the stand and make out, for the benefit of the record at least, a case which the Government had failed to prove. I have seen the office of the Judge Advocate General dispose of hundreds of cases with a review like three which I have had occasion to observe this day, one of which was as follows:

"Taking this record as a whole, and considering the testimony of the accused, there is sufficient evidence to support the findings and sentence. This case is similar to C. M. 126171, in which the findings and sentence were sustained, although the prosecution, when it rested, had failed to make out a case by competent evidence but had introduced incompetent testimony tending to show the guilt of the accused. In that case, as in this, the accused took the stand and established a case against himself by his own statements. The board therefore recommends that this case be passed to the files.

"'We want to get the fact, no matter how, for the sake of discipline.' What a confession! What a wonderful mixture of arrogance and inconsistency! According to it, fact is something absolute, that can be and should be established without regard to law, logic, or human rights. All is to be done 'for the sake of discipline.' That end is to justify the most lawless means—extortion, oppression, cruelty—whatever those in authority deem necessary to 'get the facts.'

"A professor of the law of evidence of national repute who, after brief military service, is an ardent upholder of the present system of military justice, recently testified before the committee of the American Bar Association that the system was more nearly perfect than most judicial institutions, and then, intending to voice but a mild criticism, and apparently without observing the destructive character of the criticism and of his own inconsistency, said:

"The one fault with our courts-martial is that they give us too few facts.

"All too true! Ignoring the established safeguards, discarding all rules of procedure and evidence, they give us everything but facts. They give us oppression that is approved or condoned; they give us error that goes uncorrected; they give us unfairness that destroys all faith in military procedure; and, in the end, they give us conviction of the innocent and bring sadness in ten thousand American homes. They have proved the truth of Warren's statement, as every lawyer familiar with the facts and uninfluenced by military control surely knows, that—

"Were those rules (of evidence) to be discarded, anybody might at any time be found guilty of anything.

"I wish to say with all the emphasis I can put into the statement that, by reason of our utter disregard of those principles of our jurisprudence which must govern every just trial, no lawyer who believes in and wants to see established justice regulated by law can have confidence in or respect for the results of our courts-martial during this war.

"VI.

"One view:

"While in many cases the trials of enlisted men are not so elaborate as the trials of officers, and in many cases the rules of evidence are not observed and counsel is obviously inadequate, and while in a considerable percentage of the cases we find the decision is not sustained by the fact, still I do not recall a single case in which, morally, we were not convinced that the accused was guilty. (Testimony of a reviewing judge advocate before committee American Bar Association, Mar. 27–28, 1919, notes, vol. 1; concurred in by the others.)

"Another:

"It concerns the safety of all citizens alike that legal guilt should be made the sole condition for legal punishment; for legal guilt, rightly understood, is nothing but moral guilt ascertained according to those rules of trial which experience and reflection have combined to suggest for the security of the State at large. * * * They (these fundamental principles of our law) have, nevertheless, been lost sight of, and with a disastrous effect, by the military authorities conducting and supporting the validity of the proceedings about to be brought before Your Majesty. (Warren's letter to the Queen, p. 9.)

"The two texts just quoted, the one recently expressed by a few lawyers who after but a brief subjection to military authority have become surprisingly and quickly imbued with the necessity of approving records of trial, however violative of all legal principles, and the other which is the antithesis of the first and which I should have supposed all lawyers would accept as axiomatic, are interesting and pertinent. The first, because it shows among other things to what extent subjection to power of military command deflects legal judgment; it shows how the military relationship as it exists to-day imposes itself upon professional appreciation and obscures those first principles which are normally regarded as tenets of the faith and foundation stones of the temple of justice. The last man in the world to be expected to prefer his impression of moral guilt to guilt duly adjudged, his own judgment to the judgment of a court of law, his personal views upon insufficient investigation for the institutional results of established legal procedure—should be the lawyer. What does it mean for lawyers sitting in a judicial capacity to say: We find the soldier has not been well tried; we find that the rules of evidence were not observed in his case; we find that he had not the substantial right of assistance of counsel; we even find that the decision was not sustained by the facts of record; and yet we are morally convinced that the accused was guilty, so let him be punished? That leads to something worse than injustice to the accused; it leads to anarchy. It is the argument of the mob, and leads to the destruction of our Government. You break faith with your profession and your citizenship when, in the name of justice, you can tolerate such a state of things.

"VIII.

"One view:

"Hagenback, of Hamburg, has shown that there is no beast on earth that can not be made to behave itself in fear of punishment by a higher power. The same rule applies to all men. (Published essay of Lieut. Col. Woodruff, Regular Army, concerning discipline; a prevalent military idea.)

"Another:

"Discipline, in the correct sense of the term, can be preserved in our Army only with justice and the assurance of justice. The spirit, the moral quality of our men, must be appealed to. A military leader worthy of the name must aim to develop the moral quality of the soldier. He must appeal to and depend upon the sense of self-respect and the principles of citizenship upon which our patriotism rests, and develop and rely upon the mutual trust and confidence required for the supreme self-sacrifice. (Speech of Col. S. T. Ansell before the Washington Civic Forum, Mar. 18, 1919.)

"The maintenance of discipline through fear of punishment is too much of a military motto. Discipline there must be in the Army and out of it; punishment also. But threats and examples of punishment are far less effective than the military man appreciates, and when resorted to in terrorem are destructive of all discipline. The apprehensive faculty is not at the basis of social coherence or military morale. Man, even when temporarily a soldier, is not a brute beast. The soldier's best is not brought out through fear of or oppression by his superiors. Punishment must be the last resort, a fact that our Army fails to grasp. Every year in days of peace we ran 6½ per cent of our men before general courts-martial and expelled 5 per cent of them from the service in disgrace with long terms of imprisonment; and every year we ran 70 per cent of our men before the inferior courts. Though our war army did not begin to mobilize until late in 1917 and was not mobilized in large numbers until the spring of 1918, still, in the short time intervening before the armistice, we had some 22,000 general-court cases and 320,000 inferior-court cases, and recent statistics indicate that the general-court cases, including, as they did, some of the most trivial offenses, averaged sentences of more than seven years' imprisonment, including dishonorable discharge from the service. Surely, discipline of our soldiery in this war was due to qualities that characterize American citizenship—not to the unhappy methods which the Army adopted for maintaining it.

"VIII.

"I have not been made to believe, by a perusal of these complaints, that justice is not done to-day under the military law or has not been done during the war period. (Open letter of the Secretary of War, Mar. 1, 1919.)

"This letter was not written by the Secretary of War, but for him. It expresses the military and departmental view; whether his own or not nobody knows. Out of my experience as Acting Judge Advocate General during this war and my long connection with the Army, I have had to insist that that view was wrong; that, on the other hand, our system is one of organized, spirit-crushing injustice. This insistence, while it has yet led to no reform of the system, has resulted in something of a general jail delivery by way of clemency. I quote from the most recent clemency report (June 6):

Total number of cases finally passed upon during the period Feb. 24 to June 4, inclusive	3,976
Number of cases in which clemency was extended	3,465
Number of cases in which no clemency was extended	511
Percentage of cases in which clemency was extended	87.165
Percentage of cases in which no clemency was extended	12.835
Average sentence to confinement—years	7.05
Average sentence to confinement remaining after remission, years	1.69
Number of unexecuted sentences to confinement remitted	1,153
Number of men recommended for or authorized to apply for honorable discharge (instead of dishonorable, as sentenced)	336
Number of men recommended for restoration to duty	182
Aggregate sentences to confinement—years	28,040
Aggregate sentences to confinement remaining after remission, years	6,724
Percentage of reduction	76.11

"Clemency, however, is not the remedy in case of an unlawful conviction. Clemency proceeds generally upon the predicate of guilt. It is forgiveness of sin. Justice in the case of a man unlawfully convicted requires that the judgment be reversed or set aside.

"An examination of the records will show, to the satisfaction of any lawyer seeking to ascertain facts rather than to support the system, that—

"(a) Sixty per cent of the general courts-martial cases ought never to have been tried.

"(b) That according to a reasonable, common-sense, and untechnical standard 70 per cent of the cases were not well tried.

"(c) That 20 per cent were so poorly tried that the record can not be relied on at all.

"(d) That in 75 per cent of the convictions the punishment awarded was such as to shock the conscience.

"This same state of facts is reflected in the clemency reports. Such facts are inconsistent with any standard of justice.

"IN CONCLUSION.

"The defects of the code, as I see them, have already herein been sufficiently reflected. Discipline through courts-martial is governed by men and not by law. The judicial functions of the Army are subject absolutely to the power of military command, with only the slightest of legal restraints. A court-martial is not a court. It is the agency of a military commander. He creates it and governs it, and to him it is responsible. The system not being one of law, the standard is not a legal standard, but one of conformity to the views of a commanding general. Questions of law as such can not arise, and such questions as do arise are presented to him for determination not as questions of law to which he is bound to defer but as questions to be disposed of by him finally and in accordance with his ideas, first, as to the requirements of discipline, and, secondly, of right and justice. The system, which is one of absolute penal government of every person subjected to military law, and which results in an almost incomprehensible number of courts-martial annually, is most remarkable in that it neither contemplates nor requires the participation of a lawyer at any point. The military commander governs the trial from the moment of accusation to the execution of the sentence, and such law adviser as he may have on his staff is without authority or right to interpose. At every point the decision of the commanding general is final and beyond all review. All the legal machinery designed to 'advise' commanders in the administration of justice is extralegal, is not established by law, much of it was created by me during this war, may be abolished at the pleasure of superior military authority (and doubtless will be). Such legal machinery does not function independently, but in strict subordination to the power of military command. The Judge Advocate General of the Army, as well as his office, his department, and all his functions, are by express provision of the statute made subject to the power of the Chief of Staff, and the 'decisions' of the Judge Advocate General and of every officer in his department, even upon questions of pure law, are subject to military 'supervision.'

"All these matters of military justice are left to be determined by power of military command. We may be frank without being offensive in dealing with common-sense truths. Any officers, like other men, can judge facts. But who can honestly contend that they are fit judges of law? Their training is, as a matter of fact, away from law. No man, as a rule, has cruder legal appreciations than the professional soldier. I am at a loss to see how Army officers should know any more about pure law than lawyers should know about military tactics and strategy. The courts themselves consist of military men, with nobody sitting with them or over them with a judicial capacity to govern them in matters of law. As was once said by a distinguished British barrister:

"It would indeed seem as reasonable to expect 15 military men capable of conducting satisfactorily a purely judicial investigation, dependent in every stage on the application of principles of a jurisprudence with which they can not have become acquainted, as to imagine the 15 judges of Your Majesty's superior and common-law courts at Westminster competent to form a correct opinion concerning critical military operations dependent upon pure strategical science.

"Errors committed in such trials by men ignorant of law are not likely to be regarded as untenable and idle, according to any system of law. They are likely to be, indeed they are, ridiculous blunders with tragic consequences. Proceedings of courts-martial consisting of unlettered men and having with them no judge of the law, and applying a code that, though penal, is not specific either in defining the offense, penalty, or procedure, must be expected to be, and they are, wrong from beginning to end; wrong in fact; wrong in law; wrong in the conduct of the inquiry; wrong in the finding; wrong in the advice given by compliant and impotent law officers, who recommend the approval of such proceedings; wrong in the ignorant confirmation of such proceedings; wrong in everything. And yet of such errors there can be no review, not even by any military authority superior to the officer who convened and governed the court and finalized its proceedings.

"The code, if such it can be called, does little or nothing more than permit the commander to do as he pleases. It is a 'do-as-you-please' code, out of deference to the power of military command. It prescribes little or no procedure. It contains 42 punitive articles. The offense is defined in none of these, but is left to be taken care of by military custom. Twenty-nine of them prescribe that the offense denounced 'shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.' Under this authority the court-martial may award any punishment whatever except death, and for a minor military offense may, if they choose, sentence an offender to imprisonment for life. Eleven of the articles prescribe that the offenses therein defined 'shall be punished by death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.'

"For these offenses the court-martial may, in their discretion, award the sentence of death. And two articles make death mandatory. In time of war a court-martial may award any punishment it pleases other than death for any offense whatever, and for many offenses which in civil life would be regarded as meriting no serious punishment they may award the penalty of death. In time of peace Congress has authorized the President in such cases to fix maximum limits of punishment, but of course not he, but the military men of the department, really fix the penalties. Such an application of penal law-making power has little to commend it from any point of view.

"The defects pointed out, both generic and specific, are, unless I am utterly wrong, such as to require immediate remedy, and the remedy is not difficult to prescribe."

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 144, submitted by Mr. PENROSE on the 31st ultimo, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of New Mexico:

A bill (S. 2701) for the relief of Frank Grygla; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 2702) for the protection of timber on the public lands from forest fires; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 2703) for the retirement of certain officers of the Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. HARDING:

A bill (S. 2704) granting a pension to Margaret Schwaner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 2705) granting a pension to William Ingersoll (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2706) granting a pension to Charles W. Rhodes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2707) for the relief of Ellen M. Willey, widow of Owen S. Willey; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2708) for the relief of Einar Barfod; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 2709) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to school district No. 8, Sheridan County, Mont., for block 1, in Wakea town site, Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., and to set aside one block in each township on said reservation for school purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AFFAIRS IN ARMENIA.

Mr. KING. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S. Res. 147) was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas it is the purpose of the allied and associated powers to restore Armenia to her ancient territorial boundaries and to liberate the Armenian people from the despotism of the Ottoman Turks; and

Whereas, notwithstanding the armistice with Turkey, the purposes of the allied and associated powers are in danger of being thwarted by imminent threats of a general massacre of the Armenian population by armed bands of Turks, Tartars, and Kurds, who are prepared to advance into Armenia from the west, the north, and the east, for the purpose of reducing by murder the Armenian people to such a condition as to give the Turks, Tartars, and Kurds the occupation and control of the country; and

Whereas by the terms of the armistice between Gen. Allenby (commander in chief of the British forces, acting for and on behalf of the allied and associated powers) and the Turks, the right was reserved to occupy the villayets of Armenia and other villayets of Turkey in the event of disorders affecting the life, liberty, or property of the inhabitants; and

Whereas the Armenian people are to a large extent without weapons, armaments, or means of military defense: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that the peace conference at Paris, by and with the advice of the supreme war council, should demand the immediate evacuation from the villayets of Armenia and from the villayets of Anatolia, in which disorders are threatened, of all Turkish troops and of all Turkish, Tartar, and Kurdish bands bearing arms, and should take effective measures in conformity to the rights reserved in the armistice with Turkey to occupy the villayets of Armenia and the villayets of Anatolia, where disorders are threatened, with military forces of the allied and associated powers, and that further measures be taken to effectively equip the Armenian population with weapons and arms for defense and to supply adequate food, clothing, medical supplies, and other necessities to enable the Armenian people to effectually organize an independent government and control the national territory of Armenia.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 148), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That a select bipartisan committee of six Senators, three from the majority and three from the minority, be appointed by the President of the Senate, and when so appointed shall be authorized to select its own chairman, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer or stenographers to report such hearings as may be had in connection with the subject of the high cost of living; and said committee is also authorized to employ such other expert assistants as may be necessary; that the committee may sit daily during the sessions or recess of the Senate, and it shall report its findings and recommendations to the Senate at the earliest date possible; that the expenses thereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have here a communication from Mr. Wharton Barker, of Philadelphia, on the subject of the use of the merchant ships of the United States built with public money. It is not very long, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, July 23, 1919.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In accordance with previous correspondence over the subject of the use of the merchant ships of the United States built with public money, I have prepared a memorial to the Senate, which I inclose herewith. I hope you will have it read in the Senate, so that it can be printed in the RECORD of the Senate and later made a public document for distribution among the citizens.

Yours, very truly,

WHARTON BARKER.

A memorial.

SENATORS OF THE UNITED STATES:

The use of the merchant ships built by the United States for war service, paid for with public money, is an immediate and prime question for the Congress to solve.

For more than 50 years foreign commerce of the United States has been done in ships British, European, and Asiatic, with consequent large tribute to foreign shipowners and often at great disadvantage to farmers, miners, merchants, and manufacturers of the United States, because these foreign shipowners designated the American ports from which shipments must be made, thus causing unnecessary land transportation and congestion of freight at some ports and, for these reasons, waste of time and money.

To meet these burdens subsidies paid by the United States to corporate and private shipowners have been proposed, but as these bounties would have been paid to American shipowners almost always working in accord with foreign shipowners, no advantage could result to American producers, and so the proposals went by the board.

Because of construction of ships for war service now near completion, the United States will have in 1920 between fifteen and sixteen million tons of ocean-going shipping, about 70 per cent public-owned ships (estimates of United States statisticians), and these ships adapted to every kind of overseas trade.

American ownership of this great ocean marine liberates the United States from the bondage to foreign shipowners and from bondage to American shipowners allied, provided American people-owned ships are operated by a department of the Government of the United States or by a corporation created by the Congress, all capital owned by the United States. Such operation of ships would insure shipment of natural and manufactured products from ports most advantageous for the several shipments at stable rates, made as low as maintenance and operation of ships at highest efficiency—of course, at adequate wages for officers, crews, and stevedores—plus interest upon capital and sinking fund of capital within 15 years, plus insurance against loss of ships, would permit.

The capital sinking fund to be expended for building new ships to take the place of worn-out ships.

The capital cost of the ships when taken over by the Department of Commerce or by the corporation spoken of, should be not more than $70 per ton—perhaps $50 per ton—and the difference between this per ton charge and actual cost during the war exigency period should be charged to war expenditures, so that the ships would be operated without handicap. The usual profits of private shipowners would be saved, and the public would have the profits—not individuals, firms, or private corporations.

At no time would the interest charge upon capital investment, the United States the borrower, be more than two-thirds what the charge would be if the borrower was an individual, firm, or private corporation.

Under public operation there would be no discrimination in charges and no shipments of one shipper have preference over another shipper.

As foreign ships would have to meet the competition of the American public owned and operated ships, a competition they could not meet unless foreign nations adopted and practiced the plan proposed, the American merchant marine would have almost all of the overseas commerce of the United States.

This tonnage, built with public moneys, will constitute the American people's greatest asset in its commercial relations with the world. Operated by the Government at rates that will be stable and low because operated without profit beyond the sinking fund needed for amortization, and directly advantageous to farmer, miner, manufacturers, and merchants because they are stable and low, this tonnage means American independence of all foreign control of ocean transportation.

This plan of operation of the United States owned merchant ships can be and will be opposed only by those citizens who have grown rich and powerful because of the special privileges granted to them by the Congress of the United States and by the legislatures of the several States.

When Senators and Representatives of the Congress of the United States vote—and they must vote soon—upon the question of how the merchant ships built with public money must be met, they will ponder upon the proposal here made and, I believe, will look upon it as the only proposal that will preserve the commonweal and so vote for the plan and reject all plans for sale or lease of the public-owned ships of the United States.

TREATY WITH GERMANY.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have also a letter appearing in the Evening Post, of New York, by Mr. Theodore Gilman, dated July 24, on the subject of the treaty, and advocating that all amendments should be made after the treaty is ratified. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RATIFICATION, THEN AMENDMENT.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING POST.

"SIR: The discussions which arose when the Constitution of the United States was transmitted to the several legislatures in 1787 for its adoption or rejection called forth from the friends and enemies of that instrument arguments in its favor and against it which are strikingly similar to the discussions which are now taking place in connection with the adoption of the covenant of the league of nations.

"Among those who opposed the adoption of the Constitution was Patrick Henry, the great orator of the Revolution. He saw dangers for such a government as was proposed in the Constitution which experience has shown to be imaginary. He thought, truly, that the convention was not authorized to draw up such a compact as is contained in the Constitution. He said that the people gave the members of the Constitutional Convention no power to use their name, and that they exceeded their power is clear. He said the Federal Convention ought to have amended the old system and this was the object of their mission. When he came to examine the features of the new Constitution, they appeared to him horribly frightful—'it squints toward monarchy.' The Senate is so imperfectly constructed that our dearest rights may be sacrificed by a small minority. 'Where,' he asked, 'are your checks on this Government? Your strongholds will be in the hands of our enemies.' He said, 'If you agree to previous amendments, you shall have union, firm and solid. I can not conclude without saying I shall have nothing to do with it, if subsequent amendments be determined upon.' He was for the amendment first and ratification afterwards, which is the orderly procedure which any lawyer's clerk would advise. It is the view in which logical and legal minds become involved.

"When Henry saw that the contest was going against him he said, like a true patriot, 'I will be a peaceful citizen. With my head, my hand, and my heart I will endeavor to remove the defects of that system in a constitutional way.'

"These views are examples of those which were originated by the opponents of the Constitution. Similar objections are to be heard now from those who oppose the league of nations.

"On the other hand, those who supported the Constitution were represented, among others, by Randolph of Virginia, who said, 'When I maturely weigh the advantages of the union and the dreadful consequences of its dissolution; when I see safety on my right hand and danger on my left; when I behold respectability and happiness acquired by the one, but annihilation by the other, I can not hesitate to decide in favor of the former.' This was the practical view which appealed to the common sense of the legislatures.

"James Madison, the fourth President of the United States, was the most powerful advocate for the adoption of the Constitution. He said, 'Though vast must be the difficulty of concentrating in one Government the interests and the conciliating of opinions of so many different heterogeneous bodies, when we consider this Government, we ought to make great allowances. We must calculate the impossibility that every State should be gratified in its wishes. It has never been denied by the friends of the Constitution that it has its defects, but they do not think that it contains any real danger. They conceive that they will in all probability be removed where experience will show it to be necessary. Suppose Virginia should propose certain alterations as the previous condition of her accession. If the other States should be disposed to accede to her proposition, the difficulty attending it would be immense. Every one of the eight States which have ratified the Constitution must take up the subject again. When the amendments are brought together in one assembly they must go through and accede to every one of the amendments. No less than 40 amendments and a bill of rights, which contains 20 amendments and 20 other alterations, have been brought forward. Will not every State think herself equally entitled to propose as many amendments? I leave it to this convention whether the States can agree to anything but the Constitution which is now on the table.'

"In the New York convention a proposal for conditional ratification of the Constitution was met by Alexander Hamilton in a brilliant speech, and Melancthon Smith, a member of the legislature, confessed that he was convinced by that speech that conditional ratification was absurd and weak. The legislature added to its ratification these words: 'An invincible reluctance to separating from our sister States has prevailed upon a sufficient number of us to ratify the Constitution without stipulating for previous amendments.'

"The practical method debated by the State conventions affords a guide for the action of the various parliaments and for our Senate in the action that they should take in disposing of this question of the adoption of the league of nations.

"Several States in transmitting in 1788 to Congress their assent and ratification of the Constitution added: 'The convention do, in the name and behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, enjoin it upon their Representatives in Congress at all times until the alterations and provisions aforesaid have been considered agreeably to the fifth article of said Constitution to exert all their influence and use all reasonable and legal methods to obtain ratification of the said alterations and provisions in such manner as is provided in the said article.'

"There have been various amendments, alterations, and reservations suggested by the opponents of the present form of the covenant for the league of nations in the Senate of the United States and in the Parliaments of France and Italy, and probably there will be other such changes suggested by the legislative bodies of other countries.

"Only a few countries will probably accept the draft without suggestions of any alterations. The confusion which would result from an attempt to consider and act upon and adopt these amendments was well described by James Madison before the convention in Virginia. To avoid this confusion it will be necessary to adopt the covenant for the league of nations just as the Constitution of the United States was adopted by the State legislatures in 1788, without any changes, amendments, or reservations, and then by resolution to enjoin upon the representatives of our country to use their best efforts to have changes made when the league of nations convenes in legislative assembly in accordance with the provisions for amendment which are contained in the covenant.

"When the first Congress convened it found there were 201 proposed amendments to the Constitution. As some of these were similar, the number of proposals requiring consideration by Congress was reduced to about 60. Out of these 12 amendments were submitted by Congress to the States, of which 10 were adopted in less than 3 years.

"The statesmanlike management by the patriots of 1788 of this difficult question affords a good example to be followed by our Senators of to-day, which is to ratify the treaty and covenant for the league of nations without changes, and to instruct our representatives in the league to urge the amendments which the Senate may agree are necessary and desirable.

"THEODORE GILMAN.

"NEW YORK, July 24."

LETTER OF ARTHUR LE SUEUR.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have here a letter which I may say is rather an unusual one, and if I may be permitted to say just a word to the Senate I will state why I am asking to have it printed in the RECORD. It is written by one of the ablest lawyers in the West—Mr. Arthur Le Sueur. At one time he was a citizen of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. He was employed as attorney for the Great Northern road. I simply mention this to show that he is a man of recognized ability. He became much interested in economic and social questions and was called socialistic, and while he has had no desire to hold office he has spent his own money and devoted his time to a study of grave economic questions. Whether we agree with Mr. Le Sueur or differ with him as to his position, it must be admitted that he is honest. I therefore wish to have his letter read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., July 25, 1919.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
Chairman Senate Committee on Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I do not know whether you will remember me or not, and for the purposes of this letter it will make little difference, as I desire simply to impress upon you as earnestly as I can the necessity of action being taken to curb the monopolistic interests in the food line in this country.

I believe that the Kenyon-Anderson bill is a step in the right direction. It is not too radical, and it allows the packers to be practically the sole determining factor as to whether or not the more stringent features of the law will be put in operation at all. I do not look upon this legislation as a cure-all, but I do look upon it as forward looking and going as far as the country can afford to go in a first step of this kind. It will reduce the high cost of living, which must be reduced, and it will accomplish this by making the reduction out of the profits of middlemen and not out of prices paid to the producers of foodstuffs, which prices now in many instances do not afford a margin over cost production.

I am mingling daily with organized workers in the Northwest, and I wish to assure you that unless something is done to stop the mounting cost of living we are making a bid for the kind of revolution that is tearing Europe to pieces to-day. The common workers of this country can not stand a continued advance in the cost of living. It is not a question of their loyalty or patriotism or their good or ill will to government; it is a question of the possibility of making both ends meet.

Hundreds of thousands of workers throughout the Northwest are to-day drawing upon scanty savings to add to their daily wage in making it possible for them to live. I sincerely hope that this bill will receive your support and approval as a measure calculated to afford a little relief in the right direction.

One more proposition which seems to me of very vital interest to the people of the United States is the question of the ratification of the Versailles treaty and covenant. People are coming more and more—throughout this part of the country at least—to have an opinion on that subject. The spectacle of the President of the United States telegraphing to Cabinet members of the Governments of France and England for permission to disclose to the Senate of the United States the facts under which it is proposed to deal with the destinies of the people of the United States is not one calculated to stir the pride or respect of any real American.

Again, suppose that President Wilson and the Congress in the declaration of war had said to the American public, "Let us take the Shantung Peninsula away from Germany and give it to Japan. Let us declare war on Germany, who is fighting Russia and liberal governments the world over, so that we may have the privilege of fighting popular government in Russia—so that we may send our soldiers there, in company with France and England, to take away from Russia great slices of her territory and compel the Russian people to adopt such a government as looks good to us." Suppose that had been the basis for a declaration of war; suppose that had been stated as in part the purposes for which we should fight; suppose that had been stated as a part of the terms of the treaty to be enacted into international law after the defeat of Germany.

Suppose it had also been stated at that time by President Wilson or Congress that the terms of the treaty, the actual facts upon which it rests, should never be made known to the American people—should be hid by the President even from the United States Senate. Suppose it had been stated specifically among the 14 points that the infamous secret treaties existing between Japan, France, England, Italy, and Russia were to be indorsed and affirmed by a treaty to which the United States should be a party. Suppose all these things had been known when war was declared and made the basis for our participation in the war.

Senator, do you for one moment think that Congress would have dared declare war or that the American people would have supported a war with such aims and purposes? If there be any truth in that, then most assuredly should that treaty be rejected as not being the will of the American people.

And, further, if it is accepted and ratified, it seems to me as clear as the sunlight that it will not even cause an interlude in the wars now proceeding and will furnish the basis for a dozen new wars. It is neither honest with America or with Europe. It is a desperate attempt, if I read it aright and guess aright as to the facts behind it which are not disclosed either to you or to me—it is a last desperate attempt to bolster up a decadent aristocracy and an outworn principle of property.

It ought to be rejected, lock, stock, and barrel, and a treaty arranged for between all the civilized nations of the world, with the negotiations openly carried on by representatives of the people of these countries rather than representatives of their governments. No other method of arriving at a treaty of peace will ever be successful. All of the governments of Europe are at war with their people, and the right of governments to rule people regardless of the consent of those people is a principle that is almost done functioning in this world. The treaty is a last desperate effort to keep it alive.

I hope you will give your most earnest consideration to these problems, and feel that you will do so, and I earnestly hope you will see your way clear to arrive at conclusions that will further the best interests of the people of the world.

Very truly, yours, ARTHUR LE SUEUR.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I came in a moment late and in the middle of the reading of the letter which has just been read from the desk. Do I understand it to be a plea for Bolshevism?

Mr. KING. Yes; I think that is right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has unanimous consent been given for its insertion in the RECORD?

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Mississippi was not here when I offered the letter. I hold no brief for Mr. Le Sueur, but I will say that I believe he is as good a lawyer as there is on the floor of the Senate. He has held responsible positions, and has never been looked upon, so far as I know, as a Bolshevist. It is true, as has been sometimes stated, that he is the brains back of the so-called Nonpartisan League; but, so far as I know, he has never been accused of disloyalty or of being an exponent of Bolshevism.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I caught a few lines only of the letter, but it seemed to me that the writer of the letter was undertaking to defend Russian Bolshevism and to bolster it up as a very democratic proposition, worthy of all men's commendation; and unless unanimous consent has been given for its insertion in the RECORD, I am not willing for the letter to go in——

Mr. SMOOT. It is in the RECORD now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Especially as my good friend the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] states that he does not agree with it, does not father it, and does not want it inserted as a part of his remarks.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi misunderstood me. I have asked to have the letter read, and I have stated that, whether I agreed with Mr. Le Sueur or disagreed with him, he has been and is now recognized as a student of economics and a man of exceptional ability; and that I, therefore, wanted the letter read and wanted it to appear in the RECORD. I assure the Senator from Mississippi that the letter will go into the RECORD at some time if I have to read it on the floor of the Senate myself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, it has already been read now, so that it will go into the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will appear in the RECORD unless it shall be ordered to be stricken out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to enter a protest against Bolshevist propaganda in the Senate of the United States, by whomsoever presented, from whomsoever presented, and by whomsoever written. As I understood the reading of the article, it is regular Bolshevik propaganda.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, since I offered this letter, I think perhaps that statement might refer to me; so I want to assure the Senator from Mississippi that before the pending treaty has been ratified he is likely to find that some of the time of this body will be taken up in calling attention to the matters that are mentioned in this letter; and, whether it may be called Bolshevism or not by the Senator from Mississippi, it will not deter some of us from calling attention to conditions which actually exist in European countries, and which, if we adopt a proposition such as is desired to be adopted by the Senator from Mississippi and others, may exist in this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I had not even feared that I would evoke from the Senator from North Dakota a commendation or approbation for this miserable stuff. I had thought that he was merely putting it into the RECORD out of politeness to somebody; I had no idea that he indorsed it. In fact, I thought from his remarks that he did not, or at any rate that he was not prepared to say that he did; but, Mr. President, there is this to be said: Perhaps in Russia under the Czar, perhaps in Germany under the Kaiser, and perhaps in Turkey under the Sultan men might have been justified in carrying on a propaganda for the overturning of civilized government, for Bolshevism, for anarchy, and for almost anything else out of a blind revolutionary antagonism to autocracy, but that sort of thing does not exist in the United States——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment and I will yield—and there is no justification in this country of free people, where every man can vote, or at any rate presumably can vote, for the idea of the overturning of government and declaring war upon all civilization. Now I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish simply to say to the Senator from Mississippi for his information that this Mr. Le Sueur, who is one of the moving spirits in the Nonpartisan League, is a rank socialist, and during the war came as near being disloyal as it was possible for any man to be and not step over the line.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Without being arrested and sent to jail, as were a great many others like him. But, Mr. President, that is not the point. The point is this: Under an autocracy or a despotism men are justified in proceeding to revolutionary methods; in America the man who advocates revolutionary methods or so-called "direct" methods or an exercise of violence in order to overthrow either the existing government or all governments ought to be either hanged or put in prison. This is not the forum where he ought to be heard, because we are a part of the lawmaking power of this country, and we believe that laws should be changed by new laws, that wrong majorities should be upset by new majorities, and that we can carry the torch of civilization for ourselves and partially for the world as a democratic torch and not as a mere revolutionary torch. The man who teaches violence in America in order to upset government, instead of teaching the use of the ballot in order to upset government, is a public enemy and deserves to be lynched.

THE MOONEY CASE.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk of the Secretary and ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, the reply of the district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, Mr. C. M. Fickert, to the findings of the Federal Mediation Commission on the Mooney case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Illinois will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

REPLY TO THE FINDINGS OF THE FEDERAL MEDIATION COMMISSION ON THE MOONEY CASE.

(By C. M. Fickert, district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco.)

"Introductory to their report to the President, the Mediation Commission state that their investigation was made 'informally and without publicity.' The informality consisted in accepting without question the unsworn statements of the attorneys and sympathizers of the defense without consulting anyone in authority in connection with the prosecution and without giving any consideration to the testimony of the prosecution's witnesses. Be it said, however, to the credit of said commission, that in the introduction to their report they have omitted to suggest that the same was either made impartially, exhaustively, or with any desire to arrive at the truth. Rather, it is suggested in their report that a desire to appease the liberal element in Russia was paramount in the minds of the commissioners. The liberal element in Russia has only heard one side of the Mooney case, viz, that of the defense.

"Beginning, therefore, with an avowed purpose of satisfying what the said commission see fit to term the 'liberal element,' but which, we believe, can more truly and appropriately be termed the 'anarchistic element,' in Russia, the one-sided report of said commission is easily explained. If reports which come to our hands from Russia are authentic, it would appear to us that that country, devastated by a foe from without and torn to pieces by anarchy and revolution within, has sufficient problems to absorb her attention without endeavoring to overturn a judgment legally and justly obtained in a democratic community under democratic institutions.

"But that the line of activities pursued by Mooney and his fellow 'Blasters' was the same as that pursued by the leading anarchists of Russia—with some of whom it is known Mooney was associated—is made patent in the threat published in the Blast, the anarchistic organ published in San Francisco by Mooney and Alexander Berkman, now serving a sentence for obstructing the draft, to assassinate the President of our country, Woodrow Wilson. From Issue VIII of the Blast, of March 4, 1916, at page 4, we quote the following:

"We don't complain; we understand Wilson's position; he must do his master's bidding. This is the 'sane policy'; but we want to warn the weathercock in the White House that it may not prove safe. Suppression of the voice of discontent leads to assassination. Vide Russia.

"Immediately after the arrest of the defendants, and before the case of Thomas J. Mooney was set for trial, he and his sympathizers stated that they could not and would not rely upon a trial in a court of justice for a vindication. And this in a court where every presumption is in favor of the defendant. Mooney asserted that his only hope of escaping a conviction was to rely upon public agitation. From correspondence it is shown that through agitation they expected to secure a one-sided investigation conducted by some partisan body that would only see and hear one side of the case.

"In furtherance of this plan, on September 25, 1916, more than three months before the trial of Mooney was commenced, Alexander Berkman, the notorious anarchist now serving a term in the Federal prison, wrote to Frank P. Walsh, chairman of the United States Industrial Relations Commission, stating:

"I have to join with the boys in jail in saying that I see no way on earth to save their lives except Frank P. Walsh.

"I hope that I am not exaggerating. You know that I did not call to you upon light consideration, and I rely upon that fact to make you believe that what I now say is not ill-considered.

"Berkman's plans are clearly set forth in a letter written by him to Anton Johannsen (Johannsen was subsequently the chief agitator for Mooney in the Eastern and Middle States). In this letter Berkman says:

"And all my experience has convinced me that in such matters the thing of chief of importance is to create favorable public sentiment.

"The moral is obvious * * * public agitation to change the psychology of the people is more important in such matters than big funds.

"For all I know, they may have no cognizance at all of the things they are charged with. But guilty or innocent, a worker in the hands of the enemy is always the victim, and never guilty, in my viewpoint.

"These letters were seized at the office of the Blast, the anarchistic paper edited by Berkman before Mooney's trial.

"It is therefore evident that the anarchists in America as well as the anarchists in Russia had a hand in bringing about the investigation.

"With these facts in mind, therefore, we proceed to a consideration of the findings of said commission.

"After finding upon the undisputed fact that on July 22, 1916, a most heinous murder was committed, the commission takes up the question of the threatening letters written before the parade and arrives at this absolutely untrue and unsupported finding that the 'public authorities, however, did not deem the letters significant, and the identity of their writers has never been established.'

"The unpardonable part of this false finding is the fact that had the commission asked one single question of Capt. Duncan Matheson, who was in charge of the bomb investigation, they would have learned that in this finding there was not one vestige of truth. The fact is, as Capt. Duncan Matheson is ready to substantiate under oath, that said letters were carefully considered; that they were turned over to the United States postal authorities; that an investigation was made which showed that the said letters had been mailed somewhere between the Mooney residence and the office of the San Francisco Bulletin, a distance of about two blocks. More than that, the said letters were compared with resolutions denouncing the preparedness-day parade and anticipating violence, which were drawn up by Mooney and published in the Bulletin the day prior to the parade. The same verbiage, phraseology, and sentiment found in both tend to disclose the same authorship. The commission inadvertently find that the said letters were written by an 'avowed pacifist' aimed 'against such manifestations of militarism as a preparedness parade was conceived by them to be.' The commission might further have found that said letters showed on their face that they were written by anarchists and believers in direct action. Who, then, besides Mooney, Berkman, and their followers were the anarchists, the dynamiters, and the believers in direct action in San Francisco? Taking all these circumstances together, therefore, the finding of this commission in favor of the defendants, based upon these letters, should be reversed.

"The next finding of the commission, to the effect that the police and the district attorney turned to a quarter for an explanation of this crime different from that indicated by the threatening letters, falls for the same reasons heretofore stated. In this connection it may be said that the police of San Francisco ran down hundreds of clews before fastening the crime upon Mooney.

"A reasonable analysis of the finding of the commission found in paragraph 4 will show that the same is inconsistent with itself and falls of its own weight. The said commission find that Mooney was an anarchist and a believer in direct action, but make the astounding statement that his direct action proclivities were limited to 'labor controversies.' In other words, the commission would have intelligent citizens believe that Mooney was an avowed anarchist and a believer in direct action; that he would use direct action to bring about a result in a labor dispute, but would fail to use the same course to bring about that which was uppermost in his mind, to wit, anarchy. Had the commission made any endeavor to view Thomas J. Mooney in his true light, not from what people said about him, but from writings over his own signature, all of which were available to said commission, it would have found that Thomas J. Mooney was an anarchist, first, last, and all the time; that he simply engaged in labor disputes in which he had no interest for the purpose of using violence, bringing about discontent, increasing unrest, and thereby bringing his dream of anarchy nearer to realization. Why this desire on the part of this commission to sidestep truth and split hairs, in order to protect not only a foul murderer but a traitor to his country?

"In the second paragraph of finding 4, the commission find that in the spring of 1916 'Mooney and his wife were leaders in a bitter and unsuccessful fight to organize the carmen of the United Railroads.' Compared wtih other strikes, however, the attempt of Mooney lacked as much the element of bitterness as it did of success. As a matter of fact, the whole thing attempted by Mooney was a fizzle and was never seriously considered by the company or by organized labor, which refused to sanction the same. To say that any of the utilities were resentful toward Mooney for his action in said strike is ludicrous. In other words, in strikes that have cost vast sums of money to fight, and in which the system of the company was tied up for weeks and the service demoralized for months, no attempt was ever made to make the leader or leaders pay the penalty. But in the weak attempt at a strike by Mooney, which died before it began, and cost the company not one cent to fight, the commission find, without a word or scintilla of evidence to justify said finding, that Mooney 'was an especial objective of their (the public utilities) opposition.' Said finding, therefore, is not only lacking in evidence to substantiate it, but is directly opposed to reason and the facts.

"An attempt is also made by the commission to eulogize Mrs. Mooney. No mention is made of her passion for violence as it is disclosed by the evidence. The following incidents will negative the finding of the commission: On July 14, when her husband and several of his followers attempted to induce the platform men of the United Railways to strike and blockade the cars at Third and Market Streets, the refusal of the carmen to leave their platforms was sufficient for Tom Mooney and the other men in the party to acknowledge defeat and they skulked away without further effort. But not so with Rena Mooney. Filled with rage and a desire to commit violence, even though deserted by her male companions, she leaped over the closed gate of a United Railway car and violently attacked the motorman, filling the air with her oaths. On the afternoon of July 22, 1916, as she viewed the civilian marchers coming up Market Street she, in a violent rage, said, 'What a beautiful mess I could make of those marchers with a machine gun!'

"The commission ignore the fact that three books on how to use dynamite were found in Mrs. Mooney's possession; that this gentle music teacher also had in her possession cartridges with steel jackets, of the same make and caliber as those found in the bodies of the victims and contained in the bomb. Neither she nor her husband had any pistol that would fit these cartridges. Her library contained almost all known books on anarchy and revolution.

"Attention is further called to the fact that in the correspondence which passed between the founders of the Blast, resulting in its establishment, Mrs. Rena Mooney was mentioned as one who would be 'on the job as she always is.'

"But the most astounding finding of the commission, based as it is upon no evidence whatever and amounting practically to nothing more than a guess, is found in the fifth paragraph, as follows:

"The utilities against which Mooney had directed his agitation or who suspected him of mischievous activities undoubtedly sought 'to get' Mooney.

"If this commission have in their possession any evidence pointing to the fact that any person or set of persons set about to fasten this crime upon any person except the perpetrator, it is their duty as citizens to divulge said fact in order that the said persons may be prosecuted. On the other hand, if they have no such evidence, the charge contained in said finding should never have been made. The commission apparently base their findings upon the fact that one Martin Swanson was employed as a detective by the district attorney to assist in the investigation of the perpetrators of the crime. Swanson had formerly been employed by a corporation to run down dynamiters who had destroyed some of its property and had accused Mooney of complicity therein, and which Mooney afterwards admitted was true. The fact remains, however, that while the commission were in San Franciso Mr. Swanson was in San Francisco and was available as a witness. He was neither interrogated by the commission nor was any statement obtained from him. This honorable commission, therefore, are such firm believers in democratic government and in democratic institutions that they would convict a man of the charges made by the commission against Swanson without giving him his day in court or an opportunity to answer any inquiry in his own behalf. In other words, as far as Thomas J. Mooney is concerned—being an anarchist, a traitor to his country, and a believer in direct action—his conviction should be set aside even after a fair and impartial trial in which every opportunity was given to make his defense, and Martin Swanson, because he has always been an honest, honorable, and upright citizen, who had served his country in 1898, against whom not one word derogatory to his character has or can be said, should be convicted without the formality of a trial or without even according him the opportunity of offering an explanation, and all this upon unsworn statements of persons interested in the defense.

"The commission proceed further to find that Swanson offered a reward to the codefendants Israel Weinberg and Warren K. Billings to implicate Mooney. No reward was ever offered by Swanson to anybody to implicate any person in any dynamiting. The reward mentioned by the commission was a reward offered by the United Railways to any person who would give information that would lead to the arrest and conviction of the person or persons who had dynamited the towers carrying the high transmission electric wires supplying the power to operate the cars of the United Railways of San Francisco. In light of the letters which were discovered after the crime of July 22, 1916, there can be no doubt in any person's mind but that Swanson, in suspecting Mooney for the tower dynamiting, was on the right track. Mooney, in his dynamiting activities in Contra Costa County, which in a letter to Mother Jones—known in anarchistic circles as an important a figure as Emma Goldman, now serving a penitentiary sentence for obstructing the draft—he confesses resulted in the destruction of over $200,000 worth of property, was assisted by Joe Brown and H. G. Hanlon. Letters will show that prior to the dynamiting of the towers on June 12 Mooney attempted to locate Hanlon and Brown in order that they might be with him in the same activities in San Francisco. Writing to his friend, R. C. Greenley, under date of April 29, 1916, concerning the strike of June 11, 1916, Mooney states:

"There are a great many other things in connection with this work that I don't care to mention in this letter, or in any other for that matter. You know me well enough to know how I think a strike should be fought and conducted in a case of this kind under these circumstances.

Mooney being a stanch believer in direct action and dynamiting to bring about his ends, it can not be doubted but that the things he did not care to mention in the letter were matters having to do with the said subjects.

"Nor can any adverse criticism justly be placed upon the public authorities for the employment of Martin Swanson. In this connection, however, it is important to note that Martin Swanson took absolutely no part in the investigation made by the police under the bomb bureau, but was solely connected with the office of the district attorney. None of the witnesses who appeared in this case were either procured by Martin Swanson or testified at his suggestion, nor did said Swanson either arrest any of the defendants or cause the arrest of said defendants.

"In paragraph 8 the commission wind up with a finding that 'following the trials of Billings and Mooney there was a change in the evidence which not only resulted in the acquittal of Mrs. Mooney and Weinberg, but also cast doubt upon the prior convictions of Billings and Mooney.'

"The details of the changes which the commission claim were made in the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution between the Thomas J. Mooney trial and the Rena Mooney trial or the names of the witnesses who made any such alleged changes in their testimony are not stated. The fact is that there has been no change in the testimony of any of the prosecution's witnesses. The acquittal of Mrs. Mooney and Weinberg is absolutely immaterial in determining the guilt of Mooney and Billings. Mooney and Billings were the main actors in this crime; Weinberg and Mrs. Mooney were accomplices. It is a matter of common knowledge among persons who pretend to know anything about our judicial procedure that it is vastly more difficult to establish the guilt of an accomplice by legal evidence than it is that of the principals. But that was not the only obstacle the prosecution had to meet in the Rena Mooney case. The fact that the defendant was a woman was a potent factor in bringing an exhausted and weary jury, after over 50 hours of continuous deliberation, to a verdict in favor of the defendant. Moreover, the campaign of poisoning public opinion against the prosecution begun in Russia, as stated by the commission, reached the court room, and the case was surrounded by an element of doubt, which arose not from the testimony of the witnesses produced in court but by agitation from without. When it is considered, therefore, that the defendant was a woman, that she was admittedly only an accomplice, that the prosecution had the burden of proving her guilt beyond all reasonable doubt, and that agitation in her favor was widely circulated by certain newspapers and among radicals, the verdict in her case is not even determinative of her own guilt and surely casts no discredit upon the verdicts of guilty in the former cases. It is a well-known fact that criminal cases grow weaker with age; witnesses die, witnesses are scattered, witnesses lose their memory concerning details—all these things redound to the favor of the defense.

"In the Weinberg case, the very fact that in the midst of said trial publicity was given to the fact that a commission appointed by the President of the United States was in San Francisco investigating the very charge that was being tried was sufficient to cast an element of doubt in the mind of an ordinary jury, and under our system a verdict of 'not guilty' might logically follow.

"The failure of the commission to comment upon any of the threats to commit the crime of July 22, 1916, found in the Blast is significant because it shows a deliberate intention on the part of said commission to overlook and to minimize anything that might tend to connect Mooney with the crime. The evidence connecting Mooney with the Blast is conclusive, consisting as it does of written documents the authenticity of which can not be questioned. Why so much importance to the threats found contained in the anonymous letters, the writers of which it is necessarily difficult to establish beyond question, and why such an utter disregard for the same threats found in Mooney's newspaper? The answer is obvious—a deliberate effort to protect Mooney and to avoid the truth.

"The commission also find that the testimony of Oxman was discredited and that therefore the verdict against Mooney should be likewise discredited. The commission, however, have failed to take into consideration the following facts:

"In the trial of Thomas J. Mooney practically all the witnesses who testified against Warren K. Billings were called to testify against Mooney. The only witness of any importance testifying in the Billings trial and omitted at the Mooney trial was Estelle Smith. Estelle Smith, however, was not a witness of great importance against Thomas J. Mooney, because she had never testified that she saw Thomas J. Mooney at 721 Market Street, her testimony being limited to Warren K. Billings and Rena Mooney, wife of the defendant. Therefore without the testimony of any new witnesses there was sufficient testimony before the jury in the Mooney case to warrant a verdict of guilty. Frank C. Oxman was called as a witness in the Mooney case, and his testimony is made the basis of the application for a new trial in said case.

"There were 90 witnesses called by the State, and that the jury would have convicted Mooney without Oxman's testimony is shown by the following statement made by William R. MacNevin, the foreman of the jury. This statement, made and published the night of the conviction, and before any attack was made upon Oxman, is as follows:

"The jurors felt that the structure of the evidence produced by the prosecution was so strong that they could not conscientiously follow their oaths as jurors and recommend life imprisonment. You ask me if it was the evidence of Frank C. Oxman, the chief witness of the prosecution, that convinced the jurors of the guilt of Mooney. It was not this alone. It was the whole case that convinced us. We felt that the volume of evidence introduced was overwhelming, and that we had no alternative but to agree on a verdict of guilt.

"John McDonald, the waiter, impressed us by his testimony. So did Mrs. Edeau and her daughter, the Oakland dressmaker. We felt that all these people could not be mistaken in their identification of Mooney, Mrs. Mooney, Warren K. Billings, and the man with the scraggly mustache as the persons they saw in the jitney of Israel Weinberg just before the explosion at Steuart and Market Streets. One of them might be mistaken, but all of them couldn't be.

"The attack made by the defense upon the testimony of Oxman is collateral in this, that no effort is made to show that Oxman did not witness all the matters to which he has testified nor is any attempt made to show that Oxman, in any part of his testimony in the Thomas J. Mooney case, testified falsely; but an attempt is made, by reason of the fact that Oxman wrote certain letters and by placing upon the said writing the construction contended by the defense, to show that Oxman is unworthy of belief.

"The issue as to whether the letters written by Oxman were written with an intent to suborn perjury was tried out in the case of People versus Oxman before Hon. Frank H. Dunne and prosecuted not by the district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco but by the attorney general of the State of California, against whom the defense have never made any accusations of unfriendliness. And this trial resulted in the acquittal of Oxman. In the trial of Oxman the prosecution was permitted by the trial judge to bring out every detail and circumstance which occurred not only in San Francisco but outside the State. In short, the prosecution was permitted to show every act, conversation, statement, and communication that passed between Oxman and Rigall, to whom the letters were written. The entire matter was fully and fairly presented to the jury, and Oxman was promptly acquitted by a unanimous verdict of the jury. In considering the testimony of Oxman it is important to consider that the first time that Oxman was interviewed by a representative of the public authorities he was outside the State of California, and he made a statement at said time identical with the testimony given by him in the trial of Thomas J. Mooney. At the time said statement was made the only witness that had testified concerning the defendants at Steuart and Market Streets was John McDonald, and in his testimony no mention was made of an automobile, and no other witness had ever testified that an automobile turned into Steuart from Market Street. Testimony that an automobile turned from Market into Steuart Street at the time and place mentioned by Oxman was offered in the trial of Thomas J. Mooney for the first time on rebuttal, but Superior Judge Franklin H. Griffin, who presided at the trial of Mooney, refused to permit the same, on the ground that said testimony should have been part of the case in chief.

"That a jitney bearing five people turned from Market Street into Steuart at the time and place testified to by Oxman, was corroborated by eight witnesses.

"These witnesses are: J. Walter Smith, a veteran of the Civil War, an old resident of this city, and a man of unimpeachable character. He testifies that he saw a small machine turned into Steuart Street from Market and in said machine in the rear seat was a lady and that she was motioning to some men who were standing at the corner of Steuart and Market Streets. Henry W. Doscher, a well-known business man, who was marching with the division that formed in Steuart Street, saw the machine going southerly on Steuart toward Mission. Albert Brady, a veteran of the Spanish-American War, also saw the said machine going southerly on Steuart Street toward Mission. Capt. Robert M. Bramlet, of the United States Army, also saw the small machine going southerly on Steuart Street toward Mission. Walter D. Logan, a police officer, stationed at Steuart and Market Streets, saw the said machine come southerly on Steuart and turn westerly at Mission Street. Mrs. A. L. Baldwin, Mrs. Gertrude Ellis, and Mrs. Julia Knapp, seated in the mezzanine floor of the drug store on the north side of Market Street directly opposite Steuart, saw a small machine heavily loaded with passengers swing into Steuart Street from Market.

"At the time Oxman first made his statement, it was impossible for him to have known that the witnesses just mentioned were in existence. Had Oxman been testifying to matters that he did not actually see, it would have been most natural and most probable that he would have followed the testimony of McDonald and would have corroborated the said testimony, if not in every detail, at least in its many points. The testimony of Oxman, however, shows a different phase of the transactions that occurred at Steuart and Market Streets; so much so, that the main argument of the defense in the case of Thomas J. Mooney was that the testimony of Oxman and the testimony of McDonald were irreconcilably in conflict. As a matter of fact, however, the two witnesses saw different phases of the same transactions. But the things seen by McDonald could in no way even suggest the matters testified to by Oxman.

"After the conviction of Billings, the defense produced two witnesses who afterwards admitted that they had committed deliberate perjury in order to save Billings. They were Neil McAuliffe, who afterwards testified that when he made the affidavit for a new trial in the Billings case he had been plied with liquor by the attorneys for the defense and that everything he had sworn to was absolutely false, and Dan Donaldson, who subsequently testified that he was not in San Francisco during the time that the events set forth in his affidavit were alleged to have taken place. The defense, however, were not discouraged at the failure of their prejury in the Billings case, and resorted to the same tactics upon the motion for a new trial in the case of Thomas J. Mooney. Of course, Donaldson and McAuliffe were no longer available, but one Charlotte LaPosse was produced, who took their places and swore that she was standing with Oxman on Market Street, about 1 mile from the scence of the explosion, from about half past 1 until after the explosion, and therefore it was impossible for Oxman to witness the transaction at Steuart and Market Streets. A great many details were gone into by the said Charlotte LaPosse, suggested undoubtedly by the attorneys for the defense to throw discredit upon the testimony of said Oxman.

"Notwithstanding, however, the fact that the defense upon the motion for a new trial had relied entirely upon the testimony of the said Charlotte La Posse, the same defense subsequently caused the arrest of the said Oxman upon their representation to the judge who issued the complaint that they would endeavor to show that Oxman was not in San Francisco at the time mentioned in the affidavit of the said Charlotte W. La Posse.

"Any report having for its object the dealing with the truth would have mentioned these matters. The mediation commission, however, discarded these facts in their report, in the same manner as they did every fact which would serve to connect Thomas J. Mooney and his associates with the awful crime of July 22, 1916.

"Considering, therefore, that the testimony of Oxman was not necessary for a conviction in the case of Thomas J. Mooney; that the attack on his testimony is purely collateral; that even the collateral attack is offset by his acquittal; that the direct attack on his testimony was a dismal failure; and that the circumstances are such that it would have been practically impossible for Oxman to have invented the narrative that he told on the stand, we submit that there is absolutely no reason why the verdict of the jury, arrived at after the most fair and impartial trial, should be disturbed.

"Since Frank C. Oxman testified in the Thomas J. Mooney case, the defense, with unlimited means at their disposal, have searched all over the United States and in every place where Oxman has lived for evidence tending to impeach his integrity, but none has been found. The witness is a well-known and successful cattle dealer, living in Oregon, and not interested in any way in matters pertaining to San Francisco. His testimony, corroborated in the manner herein set forth, would be accepted by any jury.

"The commission comment upon the fact that the prosecution failed to call Oxman in the trial of Rena Mooney and in the trial of Israel Weinberg. At the time of the Rena Mooney trial, Oxman had been held to answer on a trumped-up charge, but the trial had not taken place, and in justice to him the prosecution could not ask him to take the stand. The Weinberg case was tried after Oxman had been acquitted, again arrested, and again discharged. The prosecution asked him to be a witness in the Weinberg case, and he offered to come as a witness, asking only that the prosecution assure him that he would not be again subjected to arrest and prosecution on groundless charges as he had been in the past. The influence of the defense was so powerful, however, that the prosecution was unable to offer Oxman any assurance whatsoever, because it had no control over the activities of the defense, and no reasonable man can blame him for not again appearing as a witness.

"The commission in their conclusion moralize upon the duties we all owe to the cause of democracy. We venture to suggest in this regard, however, that democracy has no worse enemy than the man or set of men who, upon the unsworn statements of interested persons and without considering both sides of the case, undertake to set aside the verdict of two juries, which said verdicts have been sustained by the trial and appellate tribunals, in order to satisfy the demands of anarchists on a different continent whose views are entirely out of harmony with democracy as well as any other kind of organized government. Anarchy and murder will never assist the cause of democracy, nor will an effort to overturn the Constitution and laws of our country to save murderers and anarchists increase the regard for democracy entertained by honest and patriotic citizens. Even the knowledge that these things are done in response to the great and world-wide influence which anarchists are able to wield in defense of their kind will add nothing to the strength of faith in democracy.

"Making the world safe for Mooney and his ilk will not make it safer for democracy; neither will it stimulate patriotism nor inspire respect for our institutions.

PREVENTION AND CURE OF TUBERCULOSIS.

Mr. PHIPPS. I present a letter covering a resolution passed by the National Tuberculosis Association protesting against the repeal of the daylight-saving law. I ask that it be read and referred to the appropriate committee.

There being no objection, the letter was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

NATIONAL TUBERCULOSIS ASSOCIATION,
New York, July 23, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
Denver, Colo.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to inform you that at a meeting of the National Tuberculosis Association held in Atlantic City, June 17, 1919, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas the National Tuberculosis Association has always advocated a maximum of sunlight and fresh air as a means of prevention and cure of tuberculosis; and

"Whereas the said association considers the present daylight-saving law an aid in preserving the general health of the country, and in particular a help in the prevention of tuberculosis: Be it

"Resolved That the National Tuberculosis Association views with concern the present effort to abrogate the daylight-saving law, and hereby protests against any effort that shall tend to stop the operation of that law."

Yours, respectfully,

CHARLES J. HATFIELD,
Managing Director.

GOVERNMENT OPERATION OF RAILROADS.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have a letter from Mr. A. H. Smith, president of the New York Central Lines, who was regional director of the United States Railroad Administration at New York. The letter is a splendid contribution to the question of Government operation of railroads, and I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK CENTRAL LINES,
New York, July 17, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: When I resigned as regional director of the United States Railroad Administration certain newspapers asked for a statement of my impressions of Government operation of the railroads and my views of the railroad problem generally. I have refrained from issuing such a statement, believing that it would be best to convey any ideas that I have on the subject to you and the other gentlemen who are working on the problem. Therefore, if your mind is still open with reference to the solution of the railroad situation, perhaps what I have to say may be acceptable to you.

The human element in American railroads represents 90 per cent of its effectiveness. The other small percentage of the whole would be useless without individual vision, effort, and experience. Fixed responsibility really has seemed to be impossible under Government management. It leads into such a maze of interests and interferences that the employees do not get into that state of mind that they do in private operation, and the state of mind is one of the most important parts of railroad operation. Destroy it and the effect is manifest all through the rank and file and every part of the great machine.

I know that you realize fully that it is a business that must have the individual concern of the employee—the engineer at the throttle, the fireman beside him, the conductor, the flagman, the signalman, the section foreman, and on up to the officers of the company—they all must have a fixed responsibility. Most of the work is done beyond the eye of the officers, because it spreads over a vast territory. The man at midnight and in the storm must do his duty absolutely and fully, with no one to see him and no one to direct him. He must have an incentive—not one of mere salary, but one of pride and hope that he may some time be more than he is.

It has been stated, and so far as I know never disputed, that before the war the American railroads for each dollar paid them rendered considerably greater and substantially better service than the railways of England, France, or Germany. The European railways, however, do not in any degree compare with the American railways in extent. They are short railways for the most part, with dense populations, while the American railways are spread over a vast and, in some cases, sparsely settled territory.

If we are to become what we are destined to become if we make no mistakes—a great commercial country, from a foreign as well as a domestic standpoint—we must have sufficient and efficient transportation. Those that produce it by providing the capital and labor should be properly rewarded. The manufacturers and the merchants and the public as a whole owe that to them. Ours is a country of great distances, and with that handicap we will not be able to compete successfully with those countries with shorter distances unless our transportation system is adequate and efficient. The American railways require capital properly and liberally expended to furnish more facilities and modern equipment to offset the labor and other charges which have been placed upon them. To my mind, it is important, therefore, that a fair return be allowed, so that capital will enter and provide those facilities that will give what the country must have.

Looking backward, it is a little over a year ago when the congestion was so acute that the people were willing to pay almost anything for transportation if they could have it, and such conditions should be avoided. These railroads have stood still in their expansion and development, broadly speaking, for a long time. Economy is going to come in their expansion and refinement, and economy in rates will result, not from radically cutting wage costs, but by giving the railroads and employees a better machine to work with, more facilities, more yards and shops, and other essentials that go to make up a successful transportation instrumentality. Prewar we had approximately $450,000,000 of equipment standing idle. Since the signing of the armistice we have seen substantially the same condition repeated. This is a situation that is inevitable and the compensation to the railroad companies must provide for the lean years which produce such a condition, for the reason that it is impossible to provide the facilities as fast as the business demands in periods of abnormal traffic.

In the matter of the return of the railroad to the corporation. My opinion is that they should be restored at an early date. It will eliminate uncertainty in the state of mind referred to previously, and the morale will improve. The Government said when the roads were taken over that they would be returned in as good condition as when they were taken. That means not only physically but as nearly as possible mentally, and the Government can not afford to do other than to keep its promise. Perhaps a law can be written that will cover all the involved questions that exist and permit settlement with the restoration. But the situation is very complicated, and it may be that the Government will find it advisable to appoint a commission or board to make the settlement after the return, in the meantime giving the benefit of private operation to the people—the present system of compensation being continued as a guaranty pending settlement—a limited time to be allowed after the return to effect the settlement and avoid protracted delays. This commission might well be made a permanent feature of our system of railroad regulation and should be composed of at least three commissioners and be charged with the responsibility of keeping informed with respect to the transportation necessities of the country generally, and to make representations to the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to the revenues required to provide the necessary facilities and service and insure proper development of the transportation system.

The cases of the weak and the strong roads, so to speak, should be weighed out by this commission. If the road is so weak that it can not stand, it should have special treatment. If it is absolutely necessary to the needs and comfort of the people they should have some extra allowances locally or otherwise. The entire rate structure should not be thrown out of proper position because of some exceptional case any more than any other business undertaking in our country should be gauged by the exceptions. The question of rates, in which the public are most deeply concerned, because it affects the cost of living and the amount of business we may do, is a matter for study by experts. Much has already been accomplished in this direction by the Interstate Commerce Commission and those drafted into Government service, and they have shaped up a great amount of valuable information which is available to any authority that the Government might designate. Rates established as a war measure and to meet the changed conditions should be continued as presumptively reasonable. Prewar rates should not be the basis of future rate regulation. I believe that it is generally admitted that the interstate commerce law sought to regulate the railways on a basis of reasonableness and justice. The operation of that act, however, has put the burden of proof in all instances on the railroads, and that, it seems to me, is a fundamental violation of justice. As I see it, what is needed is to bring order out of the confusion of unrestrained or biased regulation and out of the confusion of conflict of regulation between the various authorities.

Briefly, the foregoing suggestions contemplate the prompt return of the railroads; the continuance of the present rates until changed and adjusted to meet the largely increased charges; the continuance of the guaranteed standard return until this is accomplished; the creation of a board or commission which will act as an administrative board, charged with the responsibility to represent the public interest in respect to the adequacy of facilities and service, and in addition to exercise the functions and powers of the present Interstate Commerce Commission, except as to accounting, valuation, rates, etc.

It is estimated that 12 per cent of the Nation's wealth is invested in the country's transportation systems. It is safe to say that 100 per cent of the public interest is involved therein. It is one of the great problems that we have before us. It is of prime importance that it be solved properly. Politics or theories have no place in its consideration; it is a business of manufacturing transportation. Good machinery should be used, together with good brains and full effort, to the end that the country and the people will continue to have what they always have had—the best transportation in the world; the greatest in volume and heretofore the least in cost.

With assurances of my high esteem, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

A. H. SMITH.

AFFAIRS IN ARMENIA.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the situation in Armenia is so serious that I have felt impelled to offer the resolution which has just been submitted and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I sincerely hope the committee will immediately consider the resolution and report it in some form back to the Senate for approval.

The sufferings of Armenia have appealed to the civilized world for many years. Their history is written in blood and is full of tragedy and sorrow. For centuries the Armenian people have been under the tyrannous yoke of the Ottoman Empire. It seems incredible that a nation which has enjoyed diplomatic relations with civilized nations and which has been regarded as a nation with whom the great Christian peoples of the world could hold commercial and political relations would follow for centuries a policy of cruelty, bloodshed, and oppression with respect to peoples within its own territorial dominion and acknowledging its sovereignty and control. We have been compelled, however, to admit the fact that the Turkish Government deliberately sought the extermination of the Armenian race. This is not the time to enter into a discussion of the reasons which prompted the Ottoman Turks to butcher and destroy several million of brave, industrious, and progressive people who constituted such an important part of the strength of the Turkish Empire. During the recent war, while Turkey was fighting for her existence against the allied nations, she carried on her predetermined policy to destroy the Armenian people. The most savage cruelties were inflicted upon defenseless men, women, and children, and the edge of the sword was turned against these unfortunate people when it might have been used against the allied forces. I do not mean to convey the idea that Turkey did not fight with Germany and Austria and Bulgaria against the allied forces. Indeed, she gave strong support to the nations with which she was associated. It was known, of course, that the sympathies of the Armenian people were with the allied cause, and this doubtless increased the hatred of the Turks for the Armenians and intensified their purpose to destroy the entire race. It was the fervent hope of all civilized nations that with the end of the war freedom and liberty would come to Armenia; that the dark day of her sufferings and sorrows would end and the light of a bright and glorious period shine upon her devastated territory and the survivors of the horrors and persecutions of the past. I believe that each of the allied nations desired that the Armenian people should be restored to their ancient territory and should enjoy a government of their own choosing. As a matter of fact, the Armenians have erected a government of their own, democratic in form and in spirit. Suffering for so many centuries under the iron rule of an imperial and tyrannous government, they have sought the establishment of a Republic under which liberty and justice might be secured. These people, however, have been weakened by reason of the course pursued by Turkey, and as a result of the robberies and exploitation to which they have been subjected many of their cities and towns have been destroyed, extensive areas of Armenia have been laid waste, and property to the extent of millions has been destroyed. Tens of thousands of men have been murdered and hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children have been driven from their homes and have perished either at the hands of the sword or from exposure and starvation to which they have been subjected by their brutal oppressors.

In the circumstances it will be perhaps impossible for Armenia to maintain herself for a number of years to come without aid from friendly powers. She will require material aid and support in order to meet her obligations and to maintain herself as a nation in the struggle for national existence. I believe, however, that the Armenians are capable of self-government, and that their country possesses resources so rich and limitless as that within a reasonable time a government stable and strong will arise, and the support of friendly nations will not longer be required. For the present, however, the needs of Armenia are such as to call for aid from this and other nations. It would be a tragedy and an international crime if Armenia were to perish. The allied nations have not completed their work by freeing Armenia from the Turks. A duty still exists to give succor and support to this unfortunate people.

The Associated Press dispatch of yesterday portrays the dangerous situation in which the Armenians are now placed. The Turks and Tartars are moving upon them from three sides, seeking the overthrow of their Government, the seizing of their property, and the extermination of all classes. Maj. Joseph C. Green, who is directing the American relief work in Tiflis, in the northern part of Armenia, has called the attention of the world to the serious condition there prevailing. The same dispatch states that Mr. Hoover, after learning of the precarious condition of the Armenians, submitted Maj. Green's message to the peace conference, "which had already received similar reports from American and British observers."

I call particular attention to Maj. Green's message, which bears date of July 23. He states:

> Had a long conference with the Armenian President to-day. The situation is worse. The Turkish Army, well prepared, and Tartars are advancing from three sides. If military protection is not afforded to Armenia immediately the disaster will be more terrible than the massacres in 1915, and the Armenian nation will be crushed, to the everlasting shame of the Allies.
> Relief work is impossible in the present situation unless order is restored. Can not something be done to have the British forces in the Caucasus intervene to save Armenia?

Under date of July 25 Maj. Green also telegraphs:

> The Turks and Tartars are advancing in the districts of Karabagh and Alagbez. They now occupy approximately the reopened territory of Russian Armenia. Khalil Bey, a Turkish colonel, is commanding the Azerbaijan Tartars.

Mr. Charles A. Selden, one of the very best journalists and one of the keenest observers in Europe, the correspondent of the New York Times, writes to his paper this article, which appeared in yesterday's issue of the Times:

> The situation in Asia Minor, due to hostilities by Turkish troops, is admitted in Paris to be about the gravest menace now confronting the peace conference. Furthermore, it is attributed chiefly in French and American quarters to uncertainty among the Turks themselves as to what they may expect in the future, so far as a mandate government is concerned.

I shall not read the entire article, but shall ask that it be inserted in the RECORD as a part of these informal observations. I desire, however, to call attention to the concluding part of Mr. Selden's statement:

> The most effective thing that could happen to put an end to the present menace of disorder which is involving the Kurds and threatening Armenian extinction would be, according to opinion in Paris, a declaration from leaders of the American Congress that they intended when the time came to authorize the American Government to take the mandates for Constantinople and Armenia.
> Such a declaration would quell the fighting Turkish troops much more quickly and effectively than the allied forces now in Asia Minor seem able to do. Actual acceptance of the mandate or formal action by Congress at this moment is not essential, but merely some sign of action in the future that would convince the Turks.
> If America is not to take the mandate, certain knowledge of that fact would also be far better than the present uncertainty, for with the United States definitely eliminated from the situation the European powers could at least make an attempt to agree among themselves and settle the mandate on one of their own number, thereby removing the present vagueness which gives the Turks their excuse and chief opportunity for starting a new war.

Mr. President, I do not mean to convey the idea that I am advocating that the United States should accept the mandatory of Armenia, but Mr. Selden's article is a very strong argument in favor of that policy.

Of course, until the treaty of peace shall have been ratified, it would be improper to talk of the United States becoming a mandatory of any province or territory. It may be that after such ratification there will be great opposition to our Government assuming such obligation with respect to any of the lands or territory formerly belonging to the Governments with which our Nation has been at war. I believe, however, that the American people have such an abiding interest in Armenia and sympathize so deeply with her because of past and present misfortunes that if the United States should become a mandatory for any country or territory Armenia would most strongly appeal for such protecting care. The views, however, of Mr. Selden indicate that some positive step should be taken immediately by this Government and by the Allies for the purpose of protecting Armenia. It is clear from the article referred to that if our Government should announce its determination to see that justice is done to the Armenian people, it would have a deterring effect upon the Turks and their military forces now menacing the Armenian people. I believe that if the Paris conference should adopt a strong statement demanding the withdrawal of all Turkish military forces from Armenia it would have a most salutary effect upon those forces now moving into Armenian territory.

I believe that a declaration by the Senate of the United States, expressing the hope that steps will be taken to afford protection to the Armenian people, would stay the hand of the enemies of this unhappy people. It would be, as Maj. Green said, "an everlasting shame" if the allied nations should sit supinely by and permit the extermination of this brave and heroic people.

Mr. President, more than 1,000,000 Armenians perished at the hands of the Turks and the Germans associated with them during this war. There are, approximately, 2,000,000 Armenians still living. They reside in a vast territory extending from the Mediterranean Sea to the Black Sea. These people have no military resources. Much of the man power has been destroyed, and those remaining have been denuded of means for their defense. There are approximately 15,000 Armenians constituting the national military forces, but they are without arms or military supplies. If the Armenian people had guns and munitions and sufficient military supplies, perhaps they might be able to defend themselves against those now invading their land. But because of their impoverished condition it is manifestly impossible for them to resist military forces coming from three different directions and equipped with the modern implements of war.

The situation calls for immediate aid. This Nation and the allied nations will be guilty of a great delinquency if they fail at this juncture to protect Armenia from the peril now impending and which threatens her destruction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution introduced by the Senator from Utah will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, without objection, the article referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

PARIS, July 30.

The situation in Asia Minor, due to hostilities by Turkish troops, is admitted in Paris to be about the gravest menace now confronting the peace conference. Furthermore, it is attributed chiefly in French and American quarters to uncertainty among the Turks themselves as to what they may expect in the future so far as a mandate government is concerned.

The activity of the Turkish troops under Mustapha Kaimil Pasha, who calls himself "Dictator of National Defense," would not have been started if the Turks themselves had had assurances that the United States was to govern Armenia and Constantinople. For a long time it was taken for granted in Asia Minor that such a mandate would be accepted by the United States, and in expectation of such powerful rule the Turks behaved. This certainty was based largely on what President Wilson said concerning Armenia in his Boston speech on his first return to the United States.

That speech was interpreted in Europe as showing conclusively that President Wilson himself was in favor of taking the mandate, and Europe, as well as Asia Minor, was well pleased. Since then there has been increasing uncertainty due to adverse criticism in the United States of the whole question of mandates and to the delay of Congress in indicating its future course in the matter.

That uncertainty concerning America is now supplemented by uncertainty as to what England is going to do. The leaders of the Turkish uprising are making much capital out of the insistence on the part of labor in England that British troops shall be withdrawn from Asia Minor as well as from Russia. The Turks are also fully aware of the present controversy between England and France over the limits of their respective zones in central Asia Minor as provided for in the agreement of 1916.

TURKS PROFIT BY EUROPE'S DIFFERENCES.

The net result of all this is that the Turks see a repetition of their traditional opportunity to make capital for themselves while the European Powers fail to agree among themselves on Turkish policy.

The most effective thing that could happen to put an end to the present menace of disorder which is involving the Kurds and threatening Armenian extinction would be, according to opinion in Paris, a declaration from leaders of the American Congress that they intended when the time came to authorize the American Government to take the mandates for Constantinople and Armenia.

Such a declaration would quell the fighting Turkish troops much more quickly and effectively than the allied forces now in Asia Minor seem able to do. Actual acceptance of the mandate or formal action by Congress at this moment is not essential, but merely some sign of action in the future that would convince the Turks.

If America is not to take the mandate, certain knowledge of that fact would also be far better than the present uncertainty, for with the United States definitely eliminated from the situation he European powers could at least make an attempt to agree among themselves and settle the mandate on one of their own number, thereby removing the present vagueness which gives the Turks their excuse and chief opportunity for starting a new war.

CIRCULATION OF CURRENCY.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that Senate resolution 142 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 142, submitted by Mr. MYERS on the 29th instant, directing the Committee on Banking and Currency to investigate and report upon the advisability of a gradual reduction of the amount of money in circulation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the object sought to be subserved by the resolution of the Senator from Montana is a very meritorious one, as are all similar resolutions or bills designed for the solution of that problem of problems confronting all classes and conditions of men—the high cost of living.

I sympathize with the purpose as keenly as any man in this Chamber, and I wish I knew of some better solution of the difficulty than that which, in the opinion of the Senator from Montana, may be effectual. There is no question but that whenever the expense involved in securing the necessities of life equals or exceeds the compensation of a large portion of society, the disturbed conditions which ensue not only disturb those immediately affected, but their reflex influence upon the social body is pernicious. They are bound sooner or later to lead to disturbance and, in many instances, to bloodshed and insurrection. We see around us evidences of the unrest and discontent which these conditions engender, and I am as conscious of the fact that extremes in cost have been reached and passed as anyone can be.

But I question very much, Mr. President, whether an inquiry such as is here sought to be secured will prove efficacious, because the amount of currency in circulation is, in some degree, an effect rather than a cause, and there is practically no possibility of a deflation within the next two or three or four years. All wars, Mr. President, result in an increase of prices, in an increase of currency circulation, and in a disturbed economic condition which continues for a long period after the war itself is over. An impetus is given to the overthrow of normal conditions, which carries beyond the cause and can not be arrested until it shall have spent its course.

The expense, for instance, consequent upon a great war not only continues to increase, not for any mathematically definite period of time, but for a considerable time after peace is restored. That is a fact that can be demonstrated by history, and I know of no exception to it.

So that what we are suffering from, in so far as causes are concerned, is an inflated political, social, economic, and financial condition engendered by the war and extending beyond it, and nothing that can be attempted, while it may mitigate existing conditions, can, in my judgment, sensibly affect them.

The Government of the United States was required upon entering this war to go into the market, not as a competitor but as a monopolist, and secure enormous quantities of almost every conceivable material. The insistence of the Government was not for what was in sight, but for everything that could be produced, and, of course, it was necessary to offer extraordinary inducements to secure increased production, and to meet the expense consequent upon Government demands the credit of the Nation had to be mobilized, which is but another method of currency expansion; and it was mobilized, as typified in every bond issue and in every contract which was made on behalf of the public for war materials.

Fortunately we had a banking system, providentially enacted only two or three years before our entrance into this war, under which, by an automatic process of mobilizing credits, the needed currency could be issued and put into the channels of circulation in exchange for these goods. The difference between this inflation and the inflations of the past is that the present one has a substantial basis, and instead of having the ordinary fiat money, such as was used during the Civil War and in other wars between other countries, we have a money based upon all those available foundations for a healthy and substantial currency that the ability and the wisdom of Congress could devise in its enactment of that law. It provides, of course, for an automatic retirement of issues to correspond with the decreased requirements of currency as those conditions inevitably arise from year to year in the transaction of business and the course of commerce. The very fact that we have had up to this time no decrease of currency circulation, and, on the other hand, no abnormal increase, because I think that is impossible under the law, indicates that so far as the currency problem is concerned conditions are as normal as abnormal times will permit.

Of course, there is no question about the fundamental truth announced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the value of money decreases with its quantity when measured by purchasing power, and that a man's compensation, therefore, depends not upon the number of dollars he gets but upon the amount of material he can obtain in exchange for them; and it is the nonrecognition of that fact which is in some degree the cause of the existing unrest.

We have been raising prices and then raising salaries, then raising prices and then raising salaries, then raising prices and then raising salaries, practicing the operation of a merry-go-round, in the hope that somewhere the cat would catch the end of its tail, and we propose to continue that process—and when I say we I mean the Nation at large, including the Congress—in the vain hope that somewhere there will be a check and the operation will be reversed, when the tail will chase the head instead of the head chasing the tail. But unfortunately no one is willing to begin that process.

We are to blame, the American Congress is largely to blame for its contributions to this general condition. Ever since the war began the employees of the Government have, with every session of Congress, applied for an increase in their compensation, and we have given it to them. I have made the prediction on every such occasion that it would only result in an increase of prices, with the return to Congress for more money, and I notice this morning, Mr. President, with much satisfaction that the head of one of the organized bodies of trainmen concurs in this statement in an interview that was published yesterday, as follows:

It developed yesterday that demands for more wages were pending before the Railroad Administration from several hundred thousand employees. Perhaps the frankest talk which Government officials have heard in a long time came in this connection, in the statement of W. G. Lee, president of the trainmen, before the Wage Adjustment Board. Mr. Lee told the board that an increase in wages was not the proper solution of the present economic hardships under which workingmen are laboring, because they would be followed by new increases in the cost of everything, which would more than absorb the additional pay.

MAY PRECIPITATE UPHEAVAL.

Until all classes get together to stop "profiteering," he said, the only thing for everyone to do is to get all the wages he can, a course which he declared would result eventually in precipitating the "upheaval" now feared.

Truer words were never uttered. But can all classes get together? Mr. Gompers has announced that under no circumstances shall wages be reduced. The farmers complain of high prices, but they do not desire to see any reduction in the prices of their products. The salaried man is the man who suffers principally, because, generally speaking, his income is fixed. But the organized bodies, the federations of labor, though anxious, of course, and very properly, to see a reduction in the living scale, will not consent to the consideration of a reduction in the wage scale. As a consequence I do not see that the classes can get together. But they must get together if profiteering is to stop, no matter how we may legislate.

Now, what is profiteering? A man who gets $10 a day and gives in return for it $5 worth of work is a profiteer. Any organized body which, for the purpose of enforcing its demands for higher pay, quits work and interferes with the normal operation of public business is a profiteer. A man who adds an unusual and improper profit to the necessities of life is a profiteer. Every man, in other words, whether he works with his hands or with his head, whether he is a laborer or trader, whether he is a farmer or a manufacturer, whether he is a cotton grower or a meat packer, is a profiteer if he insists upon getting more now than he ought to have for his product, whether that product be labor, whether it be the products of the soil, or whether it be a manufactured article, or all of them together.

We are all doing this. I am not speaking of it, Mr. President, in any complaining sense, because it is not unusual. Indeed, anything else than this would, in a time like this, be unusual.

There is another reason for it. We are at present paying into the Treasury of the United States every year $6,000,000,000, the most enormous revenue that any country ever raised, and more than six times as much as our people were compelled to pay before the war began. It is human nature for every man who pays a tax to pass it on, and the man is not yet born who can devise a plan of taxation that will prevent that practice. I pay my tax, and if there is any way to shove it onto the shoulders of my neighbor I do it, and so does every other taxpayer in the country.

The result is that this $6,000,000,000 is for the most part added to the cost of consumption, and consequently it is loaded upon the cost of the necessities of life. Just so long as we have high taxes, just so long will we endure, because we must endure, increased cost of living. You may have all the investigating committees on earth and inquire into every conceivable cause of the high cost of living, but so long as we are overtaxed just so long will there be an increased cost of living.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] suggests the income tax. In the first place, it has been impossible for the Congress to enact a measure which prevents the saddling of the income tax on corporate securities upon the creditor. We have tried it several times. We have brought bills into this body containing that clause, and it has gone out every time in the conference committee. Incidentally there is a disposition to increase costs in order to obtain increased income, which, of course, benefits the Government if there is an increase. The income tax comes more nearly being an exception to the rule that taxes are always passed on than any other tax we have yet been able to devise, but it is far from a complete success.

The Senator speaks of the difficulties encountered by street railway companies. They have encountered a great many. It is a matter of sincere regret that they are financially embarrassed, but, to be perfectly frank, I have very much less sympathy for the municipal transportation companies than I have for many other classes now embarrassed, because during the days when these municipal transportation companies were being organized and consolidated, to use a common expression, they "milked" the public in their watered stock and their vast overissued bond capitalization far beyond their possibility, except under most extraordinary circumstances, to ultimately meet and overcome this fixed burden, and with the war and the increase in the price of materials, the demand for higher wages from all employees, they simply faced the whirlwind, having sown the wind before the war occurred. That is not to say that they should not be relieved, but it is to say that the situation which confronts that class of activities was inevitable from the good days when the spirit of speculation and the eager desire to secure everything possible through their overcapitalization was so manifest.

I do not believe, therefore, Mr. President, that the inquiry which the Senator desires is one which will result in giving us any more information than we can obtain from a consideration of the general history of inflation as an inseparable adjunct to war and the impossibility of reducing it until times become more normal than they are immediately after the war.

That brings me, Mr. President, to another consideration. Is it wise to consider deflation at this time? Are not the evils which inevitably will result from deflation as great as or greater than those which now confront us? Nearly all of the panics of the past in this country, particularly since the Civil War, have been the result of undue deflation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment. The panic of 1873 was the direct result of the retirement of millions of greenbacks, as that of 1893 was due to the unfortunate action of the leading countries of the world in placing their monetary systems upon the basis of a single precious metal.

I now yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator this proposition, because it seems to me very logically to reach the point which he has stated so clearly: Until we arrive at normal conditions we can not expect great depreciation in the high cost of living, and the question then would be how ought we to hasten the arrival of normal conditions? Can we do that? Can the Senator suggest the means of doing it, and will deflation hasten the arrival of that time?

Mr. THOMAS. I think we can hasten it if we will. The Congress of the United States can begin by setting the example and economizing in their expenditure of the public funds, because by that means we will reduce taxation to its minimum. If Members of this Congress, as I hope may be the case, will make a sincere effort, ignoring the pressure of their local constituencies and forgetting for the present their manifold demands upon the Public Treasury, the most of which are not now necessary, I feel very sure that our good example will be imitated by the States and the municipalities and adopted in the administration of many of our public and semipublic utilities. I am very much afraid that is not going to be done.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to ask the Senator if he has any hope of Congress setting such an example?

Mr. THOMAS. No, I have not. The Republican Party wants the vote of four millions of soldiers. The Democratic Party wants the vote of four millions of soldiers. This want is an overpowering one on both political sides of the country. The public moneys are under our joint control. Consequently we are not only disposed to give the soldiers all they want, but all the Nation possesses. There is a bill now pending to pay every soldier $360 bonus for his services, which would be a trifle of about $1,400,000,000. There is another bill pending, I believe, to make it $500 each, that was introduced by a politician on the other side, in all probability a little higher bid for the soldier vote, which will take only $2,000,000,000. We propose to give them all the land they want, and I do not object to that a particle. God knows I want to see the public lands of the United States in private ownership just as soon and just as quickly as possible; but we propose practically to give every man who was in the war a very considerable sum of money, and this can be done only by taking it out of the pockets of the people. When you do that you not only extend the tendency to inflation, in a way, by increasing the amount in circulation, but you will add to the national debt, because we need $6,000,000,000 of taxes, and about $6,000,000,000 more to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government for the current fiscal year. But if we are to add these enormous sums, and I repeat with all due respect to the public, for the purpose of propitiating the soldier vote, we will add most horribly to the upward tendency of prices all over; in other words, we will be contributing to instead of discouraging the upward flight of prices for all the necessities of life.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator has invited attention to one of the very great drafts which it is proposed to make upon the Federal Treasury. I invite his attention to another one, namely, the determination upon the part of some men in public life, including some Senators, to have the States abdicate their functions and fail to discharge the duties which devolve upon them, and place the responsibility of State governments upon the Federal Government. Accordingly we have a bill here to appropriate $100,000,000 for education; we passed a bill the other day appropriating $200,000,000 for roads; there will be a bill here shortly proposing to appropriate $50,000,000 for public health, and so on ad infinitum. There will be bills here aggregating more than $1,000,000,000 a year for direct appropriation to the States to aid the States in the performance of duties and obligations which rest upon them, and which they or some politicians are trying to put upon the shoulders of the Federal Government.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true. Everybody in the country believes in getting while the getting is good, and just now it would seem as though the getting was remarkably good. My constituents want as much money out of the Treasury as possible. I do not blame them. That is the tendency of the times. The Senator's constituents want as much money out of the Treasury as possible. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is in the same position. My friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who is sponsor for the $100,000,000 educational bill, has the wants of the people of Georgia to consider. There we are. What are we to do? The able statesman of the twentieth century is the man who can bring to his constituents the most money from the Public Treasury. That is the current test of ability.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia and Mr. JONES of New Mexico addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield first to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to make two corrections. I wish to correct the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and substitute the word "statesman" for "politician" as he used it.

Mr. KING. I accept the correction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to correct the statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and say in the interest of the children of the entire country and not simply of my own State.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not mean that for a moment. If I said that the Senator was interested only in the children of the State of Georgia, I must make the correction myself. It is all the children in the United States who need the $100,000,000, Mr. President. There is no question about that. I am getting letters written in propagandist style from very nearly every teacher and association in my State insisting that I must vote for the bill.

I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he agrees with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and if it makes any difference whether the Federal Government incurs the expenditure with respect to the cost of living or whether the States do it. If the work is to be done by the public, either the Federal Government or the States, it will necessarily be paid for through taxation ultimately. Can it make any possible difference in the cost of living whether the Government does the work or the States do it?

Mr. THOMAS. It will simply make this difference, so far as the subject which I am discussing is concerned: It will double the cost of the education of every child in the country. One half will be paid by the States—the amount they have been paying—and the other half will be paid by Uncle Sam. But what is worse, it will foist another bureaucratic institution upon the Government, with its added swarm of employees protected by civil-service regulations, and, of course, prospective members of the national employees' union. And so we go.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I intended on this subject. I am profoundly convinced that we ought to do something about it if we can. I am profoundly convinced that we should make every effort to ascertain whether we can correct this terribly important condition of affairs, but I am afraid that, after all, we will have to come back to voluntary action, as suggested by Mr. Lee, who has evidently given this subject very careful attention, and see if we can not get all classes together to stop profiteering, to stop eating each other up, to stop this system, this vicious circle of a constant rise of everything to meet a constant rise of everything else.

I am sure, Mr. President, coming back to the purposes of the resolution, that this is not the time to consider the matter of deflation, which would have far more destructive consequences to social institutions and industrial conditions than our present comparatively modest inflation possibly can have.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question. Would it not be just as well to make a statement of facts as they no doubt exist to-day and no doubt will exist for years to come? The per capita circulation of this country is about $54.25—the largest that ever was known in this country. If we are going to finance Europe, if we are to build up all of the waste places of Europe and furnish the money for the rehabilitation of Europe, we need not expect this circulation to decrease; that is true beyond a doubt, and I think the Senator from Colorado will admit it.

Mr. THOMAS. I think so, Mr. President, and I think, in addition to that, in view of our coming responsibility, that we ought to enlarge our basis of circulation by the remonetization of silver.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, Mr. President, that there is no other way to accomplish the task before us than by an increased circulation per capita, based upon the resources of our country. We have not any more gold than we had, and the only way we can get more circulation at all is to increase our paper money. I expect, I will say to the Senator from Montana, to see our circulation not stop at $54.25 per capita, but if we are going to undertake to finance Europe I expect it to go higher. Some of the countries in Europe now have three times as high a circulation per capita as we; I think Germany has four or five times as much. Nobody really knows the per capita circulation there to-day. It has gone beyond any question of anyone having any interest in it, because it is, beyond all doubt, more than Germany can ever pay. Therefore nobody is taking any interest in the subject. The circulation of every country in the world has not only increased to nearly double ours, but in most of them it has increased more than double our circulation. It will be a long time before we get back to normal conditions of circulation in this country.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am glad to have had the views of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on this matter. They are always illuminating. However, neither one of them offers any hope of any alleviation of the existing conditions of the day, at which the pending resolution is aimed. The only suggestion the Senator from Colorado makes is that Congress set an example of economy by reducing expenditures and economizing on appropriations, and he admits there is no hope of that. If we have to depend upon economy by Congress in its appropriations to bring down the cost of living, then I have no hope whatever of it; there is simply no hope if that is the only reliance.

We are confronted with the fact to-day that there is about double the amount of money in circulation in this country that there was five years ago, and that the cost of living is quite double what it was five years ago. The two facts are just as closely related as are the condensation of moisture and the precipitation of rain—one is cause, the other is effect. Committees of Congress, the Federal Trade Commission, and other trade bodies and committees of citizens are conducting long and laborious investigations into the causes of the high cost of living. They need not investigate for one minute, because right here in this statement to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury can be found the reason. I assert, and it is a fact which I do not think anybody will deny, that if we should at this time double the amount of money in circulation in this country immediately there would be a doubling of all prices in the country.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. To a certain extent I agree with the Senator from Montana, but we must not forget the fact that we are not trying to take care of the United States alone now, but that we are trying to the extent of our ability to help all the countries of the world. The Senator from Montana has, perhaps, seen the bill which is now pending before the Senate which is called a banking bill, but which in reality is a commercial proposition. The complaint is now that the American dollar is too high; that the American dollar is worth $1.40 as against the money of the most stable countries in Europe; that the pound sterling has decreased from $4.86—its intrinsic value—to $4.26, and below that.

It seems to me that if we should make an effort to reduce the issue of American currency our money would again rise in value and there would be a further burden upon European countries. Has the Senator from Montana taken that into consideration?

Mr. MYERS. I have given it some thought, though I am not particularly informed as to the provisions of the bill to which the Senator refers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator from North Dakota misconceive the cause which leads to the exchange being so favorable to our country and so unfavorable to foreign countries? The Italian lira, which normally sustains the ratio of about 5.26 to the dollar, is now nearly 9 to the dollar. That results from the balance of trade being so disastrously against Italy. Italy has no exports with which she can meet her obligations and her interest charges, and, therefore, of necessity, her money goes down in value when measured by the American dollar, in whose favor the balance of trade runs.

Take, for instance, Spain. The balance of trade being in favor of Spain, the American dollar there was far below Spanish money; indeed, at one time it was only worth about 56 per cent of Spanish money; so that the cause which the Senator alleges, it seems to me, is wrong. It depends entirely upon the balance of trade. Our money in many countries is cheap because the balance of trade is against this country, while in other countries it is high because the balance of trade is so great in our favor.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me to reply to the Senator from Utah?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I assume that the Senator from Utah knows why the Spanish money was taken in exchange at the high prices that it was taken during the war. It was because the American banker and the people of our country "pegged" the money in New York, and when, as a matter of fact, the pound sterling was worth about 54 cents on the dollar we took it at a discount of about 2 per cent.

I say to the Senator from Utah those are facts which can not be contradicted. Spain, instead of sending her own money to New York, bought pounds sterling because she profited by it; she could buy more pounds sterling for her money than she could buy American dollars for her money, and that is why she bought them.

I agree with the Senator that the balance of trade has something to do with the conditions referred to; but during the war, when the balance of trade with Spain was $50,000,000 in our favor, Spain never paid us a dollar in our own money, but bought foreign drafts and paid us in pounds sterling, because she could buy them cheaper. Every sensible man must know that one of the main reasons why European money is cheap is because their money is inflated. I do not wish to take the time of the Senator from Montana, but if I had the opportunity I could present tables to show the tremendous inflation of money in those countries. It is a simple proposition. If I am worth $100 and my note is circulating through the country for a million dollars, the people who happen to know me become suspicious and are going to insist upon a liberal discount if they take my note at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. Of course the Senator from North Dakota is a sensible man, and knows very much more about some of these problems than do other Senators, and I do not pretend to match my knowledge of financial questions against the superior knowledge of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota; but the Senator must know that the rule to which I refer is an axiomatic one. Take the South American Republics, for example. Here is our neighbor, Colombia; the American dollar there was selling for 84 cents because the balance of trade was against us. In Argentina, when the balance of trade was against us, the American dollar was selling at from 74 to 90 cents. It is simply a question of the balance of trade. In Spain we were buying millions and tens of millions of dollars of her products for the American Expeditionary Forces; we bought tens of thousands of head of horses and products of which she had a surplus; so the balance of trade ran in her favor; and in order to pay her we bought exchange when our money was worth there, as I have stated, very much less than it was at home. The balance of trade was so great that the American dollar in Spain was only worth about 50 cents.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, so far as the money of Germany is concerned, Germany has a greatly inflated currency; there is no doubt about that. Much of its currency is fiat currency, and I do not think we ought to measure the worth of our money against money of that kind.

So far as the United States being obligated to take care of all the world, as has been stated by some Senators, is concerned, I think the United States ought to pay some regard to the welfare of its own people; that they should come first. I am not in favor of taking care of the obligations of the world, to the absolute detriment of millions of people in this country who are suffering because of the abnormally high cost of living.

To my mind this is a simple mathematical proposition. There is, roundly speaking, double the amount of money in circulation in this country that there was five years ago. Our resources are not double what they were then, but the cost of living is. The cost of living will not decline until there is a reduction of the volume of money. If it takes now $20 to buy a good, substantial, serviceable pair of shoes—and I am told it takes that much to buy some shoes of the better grade—no man can buy that pair of shoes for $10 so long as there is the present amount of money in circulation. No one will be able to buy that pair of shoes for $10 until there is only one-half the amount of money in circulation in this country that there is to-day. We may have investigations by Congress, by the Federal Trade Commission, and by associations of citizens; we may hunt for causes and descant upon results until the end of time; but we are not going to have any substantial reduction in the cost of living in this country until there is some contraction in the amount of money in circulation.

That is a law of finance that is as sure as a mathematical calculation. There are more strikes and threatened strikes, there is more unrest, there are more industrial disturbances, in this country to-day than there have been at any time in the last 25 years. Undoubtedly that is true, and nearly all of it comes from the high cost of living.

It has been very plainly indicated in the last few days by one of the high officials of one of the brotherhoods of railway workers that unless, by the 1st of October, there is an increase of the wages of railroad employees or a reduction in the cost of living there will be a nation-wide railroad strike. Is Congress going to do nothing in the face of this? Does Congress want that state of affairs to continue in this country? It was all right to have an extraordinary volume of money in circulation in time of war. It was necessary. We had to have it to win the war, and it was one of the workings of the flexible currency law which we have in existence in this country, but is there any necessity for that state of affairs to continue indefinitely and permanently in time of peace, together with its attendant strikes, industrial and labor troubles, high wages, high cost of living, endless chains of rising prices, eddies by the hundreds of increasing wages and increasing cost of living, and prices of products going up interminably? Are we going to view calmly that state of affairs, without any effort to find or bring about a remedy or a betterment of conditions, simply because we want to discharge the obligations of all the world and carry all the world on our shoulders? It is absolutely inevitable that if the amount of money in circulation in this country to-morrow were half what it is to-day the cost of everything would be half what it is to-day.

I do not know that it would be advisable, for a number of years, to bring the amount of money in circulation down to one-half of what it is now. It may never be advisable, and if any contraction at all is to be had it ought to be had gradually and along natural lines in accordance with sound laws of finance. I do not think there ought to be any sudden contraction. Perhaps there ought not to be any contraction at all for a while, but there is bound to be some before we ever can get a reduction of the cost of living. It is only a question of when.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator appreciates, does he not, that the prices of commodities and of labor depend not alone upon the volume of money in circulation in a community or in a country, but depend also in part upon the volume of credit that exists—if I may be permitted to use the word "volume"—in a community?

We have now billions of dollars of governmental securities issued. These consist of short-time obligations and of bonds running over a period of 40 years, as I recall. Does not the Senator think that so long as there is such an enormous base for credit—and that base exists so long as those governmental obligations are in existence—there will be a high volume of credit, and that will tend to the maintenance of high prices, regardless of the volume of currency in circulation?

Mr. MYERS. It has some tendency that way, but I do not think it is as determinative as the amount of money in circulation. The billions of dollars of bonds that have been issued by the Federal Government and by State and municipal governments and by private institutions simply, in effect, add that much to the amount of money in circulation. They are virtually money. They are supposed to be as good as money and pass as money; so the amount of money in circulation is really far greater than the amount of currency in circulation. We are living in an age of extravagance and speculation, in a fictitious age; and the extraordinary amount of money in circulation, the unusual amount of bonds that have been issued, the amount of the country's credits tend to extravagance, speculation, and fictitious values. Negroes in Washington, and some others, enjoying sudden prosperity, are riding in automobiles and wearing fine clothes, while lots of people are unable to afford the necessities of life on account of high prices of labor and products. It is an abnormal condition of affairs, but it is becoming worse and worse. There is a constantly increasing tendency to increase wages and, along with it, to increase the cost of everything that labor has to buy as well as all it produces.

I think the country is confronted with a condition of which Congress should take cognizance. It is confronted, among other things, with a very plain statement that unless there is a reduction of the cost of living or an increase of the wages of railroad workers by the 1st of October there is likely to be a Nation-wide railroad strike, such a strike as would paralyze the business of this country and bring on a panic worse in its nature and effect than any other this country has ever endured.

As to all classes getting together, as has been suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I do not believe that all classes will get together. It is an impossible thing. It is something that never has been accomplished except in the face of threatened destruction—destruction of one's country and of the security which it gives to the people. When a nation is attacked in war, when its life is at stake, nearly all of the people get together; but nothing short of that dire emergency will cause all of the people to get together. Everyone is too much for himself for that to occur in time of peace.

I do not know what ought to be done in the way of financial legislation, if anything; but we have a committee of this body which is supposed to be authority on those things, and I believe the conditions that have been discussed here to-day ought to be referred to that committee. Certainly no harm could come from it. It would certainly show that the Senate is interested in this all-absorbing and all-threatening subject, which is pressing right now at the doors of the Nation, with impending peril almost as great as that of the war from which we have just emerged.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIAL in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure, to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana one question. If decreasing the amount of currency in circulation would tend to lower the cost of all of the necessities we have to buy, would it not also decrease the value of all property? What is the Senator's idea on that subject?

Mr. MYERS. It would, undoubtedly; yes. It would bring down the cost of everything proportionately; but it seems to me that unless we in some way better the condition of which there is universal complaint, we are liable to have a panic brought on in this country by a nation-wide cessation of industry, by nation-wide strikes which would destroy property values; and that, it appears to me, is about the only way in which a panic can be brought about in these days. Our banking and currency law is said to be a flexible law. It certainly is flexible so far as making provision for increasing the amount of money in circulation is concerned; but its flexibility does not seem to work so well when the emergency is over, when it comes to withdrawing from circulation some of the money issued for emergency purposes. In fact, the ordinary panic from ordinary causes, as we have heretofore known it, I think is beyond the possibility of occurrence under the present banking and currency law. We have provided a banking and currency law by which, whenever there is a shortage of money in any line of industry, it may be supplied if that line of industry has any security to offer. It is the boast of those who framed the present banking and currency law that under it a panic is impossible. Ordinarily when there is an era of inflation, speculation, fictitious values, extravagance, natural laws provide a remedy by bringing on a panic.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether his resolution contemplates that the Committee on Banking and Currency shall take up this matter and have hearings?

Mr. MYERS. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It merely seeks an expression of opinion of the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. MYERS. An expression of opinion; yes, sir. I am opposed to hearings, as a rule. Nine-tenths of the hearings that are conducted by Congress, I think, do no good. But it seems to me that the banking and currency law needs some amendment by which the withdrawal of emergency currency may be more easily brought about. It seems to me that the banking and currency law is defective in that respect. Certainly, when in time of war or some other great emergency, great quantities of emergency currency are issued, to tide the country over temporary difficulties, there ought to be some way, after the passing of the emergency, of retiring some of the emergency currency. The country does not need as much money in peace as in war. What is only enough in time of war may be too much in time of peace, and when there is too much money in circulation it breeds extravagance, reckless living, extortionate prices, abnormally high cost of living.

As I was saying, under the present banking and currency law I think such a panic as this country had in 1873 is impossible. The usual and ordinary result of such an era of inflation, extravagance, and speculation as we have been going through is a panic. The laws of finance supply it, just as the laws of nature bring about relief when a superheated condition of the atmosphere arises; the overheated atmosphere goes upward and creates a vacuum, and there is an inrush of cold air, bringing about thunderstorms, lightning, and showers. I think, however, that the present banking and currency law has in a measure committed an abortion on the laws of finance, in that natural laws are unable now to bring a setback to extravagance, speculation, inflation, and fictitious values. We can keep on going in that reckless course, apparently, to the end of time. But there is one way in which a panic can be brought about, and that is if the laboring men of the country in any line of industry or all lines of industry—say the railroad workers, for instance—unanimously resolve on a nation-wide strike on account of the high cost of living. That would bring about a panic, and the worst panic this country has ever had, and it is to-day actually threatened.

I have now no remedy to offer. This resolution does not initiate any legislation. It does not commit the Senate to any legislation. It simply refers the all-absorbing and vital question of the day to one of the committees of this body, not necessarily for hearings, but merely for a report from that committee as to whether or not it thinks any further financial legislation at this time would be advisable, and if the committee makes a report it will be only advisory; it will be in no wise binding upon the Senate. I, for one, would like to have the opinion of that committee on these matters. I think it would have some value, and surely the Senate is not going to put itself on record as not desiring an opinion from one of its committees, the committee which handles these matters, in this day of threatened trouble, when everybody is clamoring for relief of some kind.

I submit that the resolution should be adopted. It can do no harm. It may shed some light on a subject that is agitating the country and we want all the light we can get. The country wants all the light it can get, and I submit that the resolution for that reason should be adopted without objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, one observation submitted by the able Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] prompts me to say just a word. As I understood the Senator, replying to a suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], his position is that the various forces in the United States, the forces of labor and the so-called forces of capital, can not get together and that concord or any harmonious arrangement that might make for pacific conditions and tend to avert strikes and financial or other difficulties is impossible.

Mr. MYERS. I meant to bring about a reduction of the cost of living more particularly. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. KING. With the qualification which the Senator has just made, I still desire to submit an observation by way of reply thereto.

Mr. President, I do not quite agree with the position taken by the able Senator from Montana, even though the position be as indicated by the qualification just stated by him. During the war, when there was a test of the loyalty and patriotism of the American people, I think every American was gratified at the attitude of all classes of our people.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will permit me, I made an exception of war. I said that a time of war was an exception.

Mr. KING. I appreciate what the Senator now says, but my contention is that the attitude of the American people then was only a manifestation of their true sentiments and feelings and that there has been no material change in their position since the termination of the war.

The war through which we have passed merely illustrated the deep devotion of the great mass of the American people to their Government and to our institutional life. It is true it revealed here and there a few festering spots and sordid influences. It also gave evidence of the fact that we had perhaps been too liberal in our immigration laws and there had come to our shores too many who were not in sympathy with our Government and who had no purpose to become identified with the American people. They came as aliens and remained aliens. But, speaking generally, the American people exhibited a love for their country, a devotion to the letter and spirit of our Constitution, that argues well for the perpetuity of the Republic.

I sometimes think we have used the words "laboring man" and "capitalist" rather loosely in this country. Most of the American people are laborers. Substantially all of the so-called capitalists of our country a few years ago touched elbows with men in the field and on the farm and in the shop or mine or in other industrial and manual pursuits. Our institutions—our form of government—permit the poor boy of to-day to become the capitalist of the morrow, and many of the manufacturing institutions and plants of our country have been builded by those who have toiled with their hands and have earned their bread in the "sweat of their brow."

But labor, as the term is usually employed, during the war loyally supported our Nation and the allied cause and contributed materially to the great victory which was won. The farmer and employee in the mine and in the factory—indeed, the American people everywhere—industriously labored to produce the things required on land and on sea by the military and naval forces of the United States as well as by the civilian population everywhere. The man of wealth, the banker and the capitalist, the man of moderate means as well as the poor man, all liberally contributed of their means to meet taxes and to purchase Government bonds and securities in order that the credit of our Nation might be maintained and the sinews of war supplied. No people ever exhibited a greater spirit of fidelity to their country than did the American people. No people were truer to the ideals of a progressive, democratic, Christian nation than were the people of the United States. The spirit exhibited by the people demonstrated that they are one in thought and in spirit. The spirit of patriotism and devotion to the cause of righteousness and justice is not the product of a moment, it is not spontaneously generated. It is in part the inheritance of the past and in part the product of right thinking and right living and of the educational processes past and present.

Devotion and patriotism and love of country, manifested in an hour of peril, are merely the fruits, the symptoms, of conditions that have prevailed for an indefinite period. A patriotic people devoted to their country and its cause give daily evidence of the same. Of course, this patriotic fervor manifests itself more acutely and the spirit of patriotism burns more brightly when the life of the Nation is endangered by a powerful foe. I am merely attempting to convey the idea that there is a spirit of unity and solidarity among the American people; that there is not that class warfare, that irrepressible conflict that rends asunder the social and economic structure, which the enemies of government and orderly progress declare. At bottom the great mass of the American people are united in thought and in purpose. They have the same ideals, the same hopes and aspirations. They are working to the same common end. They believe in this Nation, in its great mission, and in its divinely appointed task to hold aloft the torch of liberty and justice, and to aid in the enlightenment of humanity and in the guidance of the world. They are seeking the establishment of justice and the orderly and progressive development of this Nation as well as of all nations. In their desire to aid humanity they are not blind to their higher allegiance to this Republic. To them the Stars and Stripes symbolize freedom and justice, and they regard this Nation as the greatest the world has ever seen. In war and in peace this flag is the sacred banner under which the democratic forces of this Republic will work out the mighty problems which a virile and puissant people in a world of conflicting currents will be required to meet.

Post-war periods always have developed problems serious and difficult of solution. Some peoples have been incapable of meeting them, and their struggles have proven abortive and they and their governments have gone down in ruin. But the people of this Republic, nurtured in the principles of self-government, will, in my opinion, prove competent to meet the problems of this hour, serious and menacing though they may be. This is a time for hope, for courage, for faith, and for sanity. This is not an hour for pessimism, for despair, for distrust of the institutions of our Nation and the government of Washington and Jefferson and Lincoln and Wilson. The temple of liberty, the great national superstructure erected by the fathers, will not be destroyed by any iconoclasts abroad in the world to-day. Other nations may be rocked to their foundations. Peoples not schooled in the principles of liberty and not possessed of the ideals of those who read the mission of this great Republic may be unable to meet the advancing tides of revolution and destruction and may be overwhelmed by their destructive force.

And yet, after storms that are beating in many parts of the world to-day, and threatening peoples and nations with ruin and destruction, have passed by, tranquillity and order will come; newer and better forms of government will arise in other lands and a brighter day will dawn for the people, promising liberty and justice to the world. When I behold the disruptive forces and the conflagrations manifesting themselves in various parts of the world I am reminded of the statement of Lowell, which was, in substance, that when he saw the fires and revolutions in the world he took comfort in the thought that the universe was fireproof or Providence would not have permitted us to play with matches.

Mr. President, there are, of course, dangers and problems wherever you find a virile, puissant, and progressive people. A stagnant, decadent people have no problems. The man without ambition or purpose, who lives in a horrible state of monotony and is mentally moribund, has no problems. He ceases to function as a human being and is no longer a vital force in the world. But wherever there is life and energy there will be motion, and motion involves more or less a disturbance of existing and pre-existing conditions. This alone develops problems, produces conditions fraught with greater or less danger, and a situation calling for wisdom and patriotic rational thought.

It is not vanity that prompts us to believe that ours is the greatest nation in the world and that it has more to do with the immediate and future development and progress of the world than any other nation. We sincerely believe it to be the great moral leader among the nations and that it has been the liberalizing force operating against the crystallized principles of medieval oppression. Its great resources have made it the financial bulwark in this period of stress and international bankruptcy. True Americans, therefore, insist that it must be the standard bearer in the movement which seeks the stabilization of the world and the attainment of that position where the progressive and moral forces of the world may operate for the welfare and happiness of humanity.

Our problems are not only domestic, but whether we will or not, we have many that are world-wide in their extent. Our commercial relations with the world create international problems. The bankrupt condition of the peoples with whom we must trade and to whom our surplus products must be sent compel the consideration of questions that go to the heart of our economic system.

Mr. President, the conditions referred to by the Senator from Montana and others who have spoken are only such as are to be expected after the world conflagration through which we have just passed. An era of high prices usually follows wars, particularly where inflation has been as extensive as that which has occurred during the past five years. It would be impossible for billions of dollars of currency to be placed in circulation and billions of dollars of credits mobilized and put into operation without there being an enormous advance in not only the prices of commodities but of all forms of property. Such a situation results in cheap money and higher commodity prices. Inevitably there will follow high wages and high prices of all property, real and personal, and particularly the articles essential for consumption. All statesmen and persons who have familiarized themselves with history and with world conditions expected as an aftermath of the war very serious industrial and economic conditions, and anticipated that crises, perhaps political and certainly economic, would exist in many countries. We need not expect that our Nation will be free from the influences of the war, and that it will escape dangers and difficulties which are necessary concomitants to the transition period from war to the tranquil days of peace. But the American people will meet the problems and dangers and difficulties with courage, with confidence, and with the knowledge that they will successfully solve them. Our form of government will not be changed nor this Republic destroyed. There is no fertile soil in this country for Bolshevism and communism or the anarchy which may find expression in some other lands. The American people at heart are sound and sane, loyal to the principles underlying this Republic, and are guided by the inspiration that has led the Christian people who gave us this Nation and who have preserved it for us and for those who shall come after us. No radical revolutionary minority will destroy majority rule or convert this Republic into a Bolshevist dictatorship.

Unquestionably the war and the conditions now existing in the world have produced in the world a large number of people who seek the destruction of all organized government, and who would precipitate the entire world into a deadly class conflict.

The Bolshevists of Russia have established a brutal, oppressive, and bloody dictatorship. The people of Russia do not rule; indeed the Bolshevist creed as expounded by Lenin and Trotski forbids majority rule. Bolshevism is no democracy; it is not the rule of the people. It is not the expression of liberty or freedom or justice or orderly growth or evolutionary development or true and genuine progress. The class warfare is the most cruel and destructive of all warfare. This is shown in the destructive and barbarous control by the Bolshevists of certain portions of Russia where Bolshevism is sustained, in part, by alien troops. It is not to be expected that this country would be entirely free from these revolutionary influences which have worked so disastrously in Russia, and which are seeking the overthrow of all governments of Europe. Unfortunately there are in our midst a few communists, Bolshevists, revolutionists, men who are disloyal to our Government, and who would overthrow it as they would also destroy all government. They are seeking to poison the minds of the American people, to breed discontent and distrust among the laborers of the land, and to light the fires of revolution in this Republic. They are promoting strikes, inciting riots, and availing themselves of every possible means to prevent the restoration of normal conditions and the orderly growth and progress of the economic and political life of the people. These influences speak through a few wicked and disloyal newspapers. It is my opinion, however, that these newspapers will find but few sympathetic readers in the United States. The efforts to spread discontent and sedition and to array class against class and to destroy the faith of the American people in this Republic and in the orderly processes which underlie civilization will prove abortive. The true, the genuine laboring man of this country is not a Bolshevik, he is not an enemy to his country, he sees the sophistry, the lies, and the subtle intrigue of the sinister figures throughout the land. He is able to unmask their hypocrisy and to understand that instead of being the friends of labor and of progress and civilization they are the foes, the deadly and diabolical foes, of everything that is good and noble and just and righteous in this land and throughout the world.

Mr. President, this hour calls for genuine patriotic service upon the part of the American people. I say patriotic service because patriotism manifests itself as much in peace as in war. It calls for devotion to country and to flag in hours of peace as well as when foes seek to pollute our land. We need never fear the military aggressions of any foreign foe. Any dangers that this Nation encounters will be of a domestic character—will be from within, not from without. While it is true nations have been destroyed by superior military powers, I think history proves that more nations have died from self-inflicted wounds. There is national sabotage and national suicide as well as destruction from international foes.

But I firmly believe that the men who toil and the men who own the factories and the great industrial plants of our country—indeed, that all classes, rich and poor, capitalist and laborer—will patriotically join hands for the purpose of solving the industrial and economic problems now before the American people and the world. I believe that labor will bring to the conference of the Nation a spirit of justice and fairness that will make more easy the solution of the problem, and I believe that capital will sit down with labor, and together a course will be mapped out that will make for industrial peace and tranquillity and for the development of the political ideals of the American people. Labor must not only have a living wage but a fair and generous wage. Its living conditions must not only be tolerable but such as comport with what a free and producing people should enjoy. It must be admitted that in the past there has been too often a disregard of the rights of labor. There has been too much selfishness upon the part of the employer. It must not be forgotten that we are indissolubly bound together and that whatever contributes to the benefit of one proves advantageous to all, and whatever hurts the one injures the many.

This is a time for forbearance and patience. During this period the spirit of justice and fair dealing should dominate all. Of course human nature will manifest itself and there will be among all classes some who try to overreach and seek to profit by the misfortunes and at the expense of others; but I can not help but believe that the spirit evinced by the American people during the war is still the controlling note in their business relations and in all of their activities. Sacrifice was the triumphant note of the war. It will be the controlling note in this period of readjustment. There must be no jealousies and class distinctions and class warfare, but as the war brought all Americans together so that all touched shoulders and rubbed elbows and drank from the same fountain of inspiration, so now, when dangers threaten the Republic, the same spirit must be controlling and dominate the activities of the people. I therefore reply to the distinguished Senator from Montana that, in my opinion, the American people will get together. There will be a concerted effort to solve the questions confronting this Republic. Laborers' rights will be recognized and the rights of property will be protected. There will be, I believe, a larger consecration of the people to the service of humanity. There will be an insistent demand that justice shall be enjoyed by the humblest and that the sacrifices of the war shall result in enriching the lives not only of the peoples of this land but of every land. This is no time for alarm or for hysterical legislation or untried experiments. The lamp of experience sheds its light along our pathway. We need not stumble or fall. Heeding the lessons of the past and following the light that God gives for the guidance of humanity, the future of this Nation will be secure. The mountain before us may be scaled; the people of this great Republic see the heights ahead, and with courage and faith in their destiny, and devotion to the principles of liberty and justice, they will steadfastly march to their goal.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I have listened to the discussion here with some interest, and I want to say just a few words.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending resolution go over until to-morrow without prejudice; otherwise it will go on the calendar at 2 o'clock. I shall, however, be very glad to hear what the Senator from Arkansas has to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the resolution will go over without prejudice.

Mr. KIRBY. The time has come, it seems to me, when something besides talking about it should be done to reduce the high cost of living. We talk about the American people rising to this emergency and the problem being satisfactorily solved. Some say we have faith that this will be done, but it is about time this faith should be accompanied by something else. In the Scripture it is said, "Faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." We have had a lot of faith expressed here, but nothing has been done by the Government or Congress in this condition to relieve it, and something ought to be done. This resolution has been suggested, and it is thought by its author that it might result beneficially along that line. I am going to say just one or two things about the matter. First I quote from a message of a President of the long ago. After congratulating our country upon the conditions existing he said:

> With all these blessings—
> After recounting them—
> what more is necessary to make us a happy and a prosperous people? Still one thing more, fellow citizens—a wise and frugal Government which shall restrain men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government, and this is necessary to close the circle of our felicities.

What is the condition to-day? There is unrest and discontent, exorbitant charges and outrageous exactions complained of everywhere in the United States of America.

What is the condition in commerce? The clothiers met the other day in New York City and announced that we would better buy our clothing now, since it would be 100 per cent higher this fall. The shoe manufacturers and dealers met recently and said in effect to the people, "You may as well buy your shoes at the present prices, because shoes are going to advance in price, and may be $30 a pair in the coming autumn."

Why should not a reduction instead of an advance in the price of both shoes and clothing be realized? The 246,000,000 pounds of wool taken by the Government for Army supplies for 1919 has been released for civilian use and in addition there was the 15,000,000 pounds allocated for commercial purposes. The war is over. There is now no need for the enormous blanket and clothing supply for the Army, nor for the purchase of 20,000,000 pairs of shoes yearly for the men. The people are demanding a reduction in price of the necessaries of life. The conditions warrant its being made, and they are entitled to have it done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3854) for the repeal of the daylight-saving law.

Mr. KIRBY. The Department of Labor in its last bulletin has stated:

> The price of food for the United States shows an increase of 4 per cent for April, 1919, as compared with March, 1919.

Food prices are increasing 4 per cent a month with the war over. And further—

> * * * In April, 1919, the cost of all articles of food combined was 18 per cent more than in April, 1918.

The cost of food in this country in April this year, six months after the armistice was signed, was 18 per cent higher than it was when war was flagrant, when everybody was drawing to the limit on his means to buy Liberty bonds and we had 4,000,000 men in the Army to maintain. That is the condition which now confronts this country and we must take steps for relief against it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask for information only, not for the purpose of diverting the Senator. I saw in a paper two or three days ago that the farmers were receiving 23 cents a pound for hogs on foot, a very high price for their corn, and that they were charging very high prices for their vegetables and all farm produce. Does the Senator think that the farmers were profiteering and are profiteering in the charges they are making for their products?

Mr. KIRBY. The farmers are only meeting the situation which has been forced upon them and everybody else by the condition existing in the country, the necessities of the case.

I think the Government is largely to blame for this condition, and I am going to tell you where and why. We have vast stores of supplies that we purchased for the Army that have not been used. They have not been sold at a discount, they have not been put on the market at 25 to 40 per cent less than they cost, so the people could have had the benefit of them at the reduced prices. The Government must lose in any event. War is the most wasteful of all human activities, and it might have taken its loss along that line and have remedied living conditions. But what did the Government do? While the war was being waged the Government had to take advantage in its preparations of the best intellect and business ability from all over this country in order to procure and increase the manufacture of munitions and supplies that had to be provided. It called all the best business men in the country and encouraged them to combine and to allow high prices that would stimulate all those activities. That was done while the war was on. From that same practice permitted by the Government in a time of direst need they have still remembered the art of combination to increase prices, and are still keeping up the prices and putting them higher and higher. The Government approved the practice in the first instance, and the Government now is encouraging it, and how?

The Government said, before the war was over, we will fix the price of wheat at $2.26 a bushel. After the war was over and before more than one-fourth of the wheat crop was planted, what was done? The Congress passed the wheat guaranty price bill, providing that the Government would pay $2.26 a bushel, the guaranteed price, and an appropriation was made for that purpose. That necessarily keeps the price of wheat at $2.26. I offered an amendment to that bill at the time——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to inform the Senator that wheat is selling in Minneapolis to-day at $3.05 a bushel.

Mr. KIRBY. I will state to the Senator that I introduced an amendment at that time which provided that it should be unlawful for the governmental agencies to manipulate the market and cause wheat and wheat products to sell for more than the price would have been if no such regulation had been provided and no such price guaranteed; in other words, if under the usual law of supply and demand wheat would have gone to $1 or $1.25 a bushel, then the Government should not have manipulated the market to make the consumer pay $2.26 in order to give the producer the other $1.26. If the Government thought it was necessary under the conditions to pay the fixed price, it ought to have paid the bonus out of the Treasury. That amendment was defeated and the bill passed, and that has been done by the Congress. Those supplies are still stored and have not been sold. There are automobiles all over the country which are not being sold—and why? Because it is feared evidently that the manufacturers would not be able, if they were put on the market at a reduced price, to get the prices they are demanding for the new product. There is no other reason on earth that can be advanced.

Let us go a little further. Let us consider the price of steel. The Government fixed the price of steel during the war emergency. After the war was over and the people had a right to expect a readjustment under new conditions, the governmental agency here in Washington fixed the price of steel and set it so high that the Director General of Railroads refused to pay it, stating it was an outrage and that he would not buy steel for the railroads at such a price, but he finally had to buy at the outrageous and exorbitant price, as he believed, because the governmental agency that was supposed to be here operating for the benefit of the people of these United States had fixed the price. That is another thing. If this price of steel should be reduced to where it ought to be—and, Mr. President, in talking about this matter, I have rather criticized others, because we all talk about saving the country and redeeming the situation and relieving it, without any suggestion as to what should really be done.

We fixed the price of certain things while the war was going on, and if conditions do not improve, in my judgment, the Government of the United States must fix the price of products that are sold. I am going to offer a resolution, when it is in order, but I am going to read it now:

> Resolved, That the Senate Judiciary Committee be, and it is hereby, instructed to report whether it is practicable, and if so, to report a bill providing adequately for the fixing of maximum sale prices of not less than 25 per cent less than the prevailing market price on all articles, products, and commodities transported in interstate commerce, with a view to a reduction in the high cost of living.

I am going to offer that resolution and have it submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, composed of lawyers of the Senate, to get the benefit of their combined wisdom upon the legality of the proposition. So far as I am concerned, I am satisfied that it is feasible. I know the Government has the power to do it, and certainly the necessity exists.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator know that from the days of antiquity very wise men in nearly all governments, in times of crises, have risen up and insisted upon the fixing of prices, either maximum or minimum or both, as a panacea for the evils existing, as a cure for high prices, and does not the Senator know that every publicist of any authority, every economist of any standing in any country—and when I say every one I mean substantially all—has reached the conclusion that an attempt by the Government to fix prices has been and, in the nature of things must be, a failure; that the law of supply and demand coupled with statutes against regrating and forestalling, such as the common law provided in England and such as the Sherman antitrust law provided in the United States, are sufficient to meet existing conditions, and that an attempt by the Government to establish prices fails; that even in Germany, during the war, where they had a repressive autocracy, having a military government stronger than any other in the world, price fixing was a failure, so recognized there and so recognized by political economists everywhere?

Mr. KIRBY. So far as price control by regular law of supply and demand is concerned we all agree that that is the best method, that that is the natural and usual method, but when you undertake to control the law of supply and demand by conspiracy or by agreement or by law, then there ought to be something else done; the restrictions should be removed or the condition relieved by other appropriate suggestion.

As to price fixing being a failure, why did you fix the price of steel during the war? Why did you fix the price of wheat when flour went to $18 a barrel? You fixed it because it was necessary and you had the power to do it. It can be done now, in my judgment, and I shall ask that this sort of a resolution go to the committee and that something be done along that line to furnish relief.

The trouble in this country is too credulous a disposition, as some have said, to believe that the people ought to get together and they ought to agree on the reduction of prices. There never has been a meeting by manufacturers and producers in this country for reducing the price of their products, and there never will be. It has always been for the purpose of enhancing and putting up prices and taking all that the traffic would bear. It is the business of the Government, the business of the Congress, to look after these matters and to see that we have as much as possible a wise, frugal Government which shall restrain men from injuring one another and shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement. But we have gotten too far away from that I am afraid. I presume the Senators know that statement is contained in Jefferson's inaugural message. It was the "sum of good government" then and it is the sum of good government now.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Harris	Moses	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Henderson	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Johnson, Calif.	New	Smoot
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Spencer
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Sutherland
Curtis	Kenyon	Overman	Thomas
Dial	King	Page	Trammell
Dillingham	Kirby	Penrose	Underwood
Elkins	Knox	Phipps	Wadsworth
Fall	La Follette	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	Lenroot	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Gay	McCumber	Ransdell	Warren
Gronna	McKellar	Sheppard
Harding	McNary	Simmons

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], is absent on important business.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I regret having announced yesterday that I should expect to address the Senate this morning after the close of morning business, as undoubtedly it has embarrassed some of the Senators who desired to speak to be hurried through the remarks which they might have to make.

Mr. President, if I were an orator, I presume that, as other orators in the body, I could discuss the league of nations or any other matter from a position in the clouds, but as my ability does not measure up to the point of oratory it is necessary for me, if I propose to discuss any question whatsoever intelligently, to feel that I have some foundation, some firm ground under my feet, upon which to stand. This will be my excuse in approaching the discussion of some of the provisions of the proposed constitution of the league of nations for occupying a portion of the time of the Senate in endeavoring to get back to earth out of the clouds, out of the realm of speculation, to get back to the United States of America, if it is possible for Americans to do so at this time. So I wish to call the attention of the Senate of the United States for a few moments to some occurrences in American history that I may have a standpoint from which to discuss, as I propose to discuss more in detail, the various provisions of the league of nations.

We are listening every day to speeches and addresses referring to the "spirit" of the American people; to the desire of the American people to serve mankind; of the duty of the American people to the Buddhists of Japan and India, the Confucians of China, the Voodoo worshipers of Africa, the fire worshipers of Persia, the Mohammedans of Turkey, the Jews and gentiles of the world—in fact, to all the peoples and races and tribes beyond the bounds of the United States and its insular possessions.

It might appear to some pigmy minds and to those of limited mental horizon that indeed the proponents and supporters of the league had entirely forgotten or overlooked the interests of the people of the United States of America, or that such interests were regarded as merely selfish and unworthy of consideration; that patriotism defined as "love of country," "the passion inspiring one to serve one's own country," had during the last few years become an obsolete word, and certainly that the sentiment formerly expressed by the word was, as in effect declared upon more than one occasion by President Wilson, merged into or confounded with the "spirit" of America in dealing honorably, fairly, justly, and generously with and by other peoples of the world.

To my mind, such American spirit of just and fair dealing is the outgrowth of enlightened American patriotism of love of our country; of loyalty to its Government, of a common understanding of its Constitution and laws, and of profound conviction that the perpetuity and growth of its institutions should and will ever be the care and pride of its citizens.

Realizing that I am a mental dwarf by comparison with the league proponents and some of its supporters; admitting that, in my insistence upon care for and consideration of the interests of the people of the United States of America first, my political horizon is limited and my action to some extent selfish; admitting that my pride is in being an American and not a follower of Karl Marx, I propose to refer briefly to a few paragraphs in our history.

It occurs to me that enlightened American patriotism spoke on April 6, 1917, through the Congress of the United States, in declaring war upon the Imperial German Government after hearing the President, in pursuance, as he said, of his constitutional duty, solemnly advise on April 2:

> With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States; that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense, but also to exert all its power, and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms, and end the war.

It has always been my conviction that American patriotism spoke through the Declaration of Independence and that it crystallized into the Constitution adopted and the Government formed under it in 1789.

American patriotism spoke in 1798 when the Congress, in resentment of the acts of the French agents in this country; of the French ships and privateers upon the sea; of the French armed forces in Martinique; of the action of the French Government itself in demanding tribute from our commissioners; of French insults and demands, placed this country upon a war footing, sent its ships of war against those of the French fleet and called Washington from his retirement at Mount Vernon to lead American forces, if necessary, in defense of American honor and American rights against the aggressions of the French; and it spoke again when the American Congress of loyal, patriotic Americans denounced the league, or treaty of alliance with France.

American patriotism answered in no uncertain terms to the suggestion of President Jefferson that this country no longer submit to the tribute exacted by the Algerian and Tripolitan pirates, and when he sent Decatur to the coast of Barbary, and in 40 days after the sailing of our vessels, secured that freedom of commerce which England, France, and older nations of the world had never been able to wrest from the outlaws of the African coast.

American patriotism again spoke through the Congress of the United States and through its people when we declared war against Great Britain because of her outrageous oppression of our commerce and the indignities heaped by her upon our sailors and citizens in 1812.

American patriotism was voiced by the Congress of the United States, when by the resolution of January 15, 1811, it provided that:

> Taking into view the peculiar situation of Spain and of her American Provinces, and considering the influence which the destiny of the territory adjoining the southern border of the United States may have upon their security, tranquillity, and commerce: Be it
> Resolved, That the United States under the peculiar circumstances of the existing crisis can not without serious inquietude see any part of the said territory pass into the hands of any foreign power; and that a due regard for their own safety compels them to provide, under certain contingencies, for the temporary occupation of the said territory; they at the same time declaring that the said territory shall, in their hands, remain subject to future negotiations.

American patriotism enlightened and informed, crystallized in the words of Jefferson and Monroe in 1823, the American doctrine of self-defense suggested by Washington in his papers and in his Farewell Address and the Monroe doctrine, remains, until recently, unchallenged as the declaration of American patriotism and American policy.

American patriotism again was voiced in the resolution annexing Texas, and in the Mexican War at the battles of Buena Vista, Sacramento, and Chapultepec.

American patriotism spoke in the four bloody years of 1860 to 1865, and thus speaking, as those who died and who lived through the fearful conflict believed, saved the American Union undivided and supreme as the heritage of their children and their children's children through unknown generations.

Again American patriotism spoke in 1898, and through its declaration and by its action with armed forces secured the freedom of the Cubans from hundreds of years of oppression and Weylerism, destroying concentrado camps, feeding the starving, and establishing a nation of free men near our shores.

One of the results of its words and its actions was the wresting of the Philippine Islands from the domination of Spain, and we have seen its further results through the presentation in recent days of the claim for absolute independence of those islands, upon the theory that within 20 years' time American policy and American spirit have done more to civilize and equip these people for self-government than had been done under 400 years of Spanish domination.

The same declaration and the same action attached the people of Porto Rico to this country, to be followed only last year by the bestowal upon the people of that island of the self-governing constitution under which we expect to see them in a very brief period fitted either for independence or for sovereign statehood within the United States of America, under its Constitution and under its laws.

And, finally, in arms American patriotism answered the call of the American President in April, 1917, when he requested of the Congress of the United States that it declare a status of war as thrust upon us by the acts of the Imperial German Empire, and so speaking it gave 4,000,000 of the youth of this country for the service of this country, and that in serving its country it might, as it must, serve civilization, Christianity, and the cause of peace over the civilized world.

No greater evidence of patriotism was ever evinced by any people than those of the remaining 110,000,000 who stayed at home, sacrificing their own comfort, yielding to those in need a portion of their own daily sustenance, paying without regret or hesitation taxes such as here had never been dreamed of before, lending of their wealth at a sacrifice to their own business, comfort, and welfare, such enormous sums of money to the other peoples of the world as prior to 1917 could only be calculated by some mathematical expert in the recesses of some statistical office.

American patriotism and care for American interests, love of country, belief in its institutions and confidence in its great future, prevailed over the objections of the French, our Allies, and against the contentions of the English, our recent opponents, when in 1782 we secured from Great Britain that vast territory extending along parallel 49 and down the Mississippi to the Floridas, more than doubling the area of those 13 States which had but recently won their independence from Great Britain.

Again American patriotism exhibited itself in 1803, when, through the great patriot, Jefferson, we secured from France that vaster territory extending to the Pacific and embracing nearly 900,000 square miles which we have since erected into 14 States with a population of more than 25,000,000.

American spirit of loyalty and patriotism has never achieved a greater diplomatic victory over Great Britain, Spain, France, and of the world than by Jefferson and his agents in securing this the Louisiana Purchase.

Again American patriotism spoke through the vigorous action of Gen. Andrew Jackson and the governor of Georgia and other American patriots when we first declared West Florida and later East Florida our territory and finally cleared our title in 1819 by the treaty with Spain, and from which territory we have since created the State of Florida and a portion of the State of Alabama.

As I have said in referring to the occasions upon which our patriotism has exercised armed force, the spirit of enlightened American patriotism again made itself heard when we added Texas to this Union of States and secured, through the treaties of Guadalupe Hidalgo and Gadsden, the territory now comprising the States of California, Arizona, New Mexico, and a portion of the State of Colorado.

Again was it heard in 1846, when, meeting the contentions of Great Britain, it added to our territory 250,000 square miles which now comprises all or a portion of the States of Idaho, Washington, and Oregon.

In 1867 American patriotism, loyalty, regard for the eventual safety and for the present and future welfare of our country, spoke in opposition to the "little Americans" when we acquired Alaska from Russia and added 600,000 square miles now constituting the only remaining territory within our continental confines.

American patriotism and far-sighted American policy and regard for our country and its people finally made itself heard in the peaceful acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands.

Let us distinguish a moment the American spirit of justice and of fair dealing.

The American spirit of justice and of fair dealing to all nations has evinced itself in all the treaties entered into by this country with foreign countries since that of 1782, with Great Britain, down to and including the recent reratification of the expiring arbitration treaties with Great Britain, France, and other nations.

This American spirit of fair dealing, this American recognition of justice and right in our dealings with other nations and in our dealings with all the peoples of such other nations wherever they may be found; this recognition of the rights of such peoples and such nations to pursue their own lawful course under such form of government as may be pleasing to them; this spirit of equity and fair play and reciprocity inaugurated by the American patriots who first negotiated our treaties with Prussia in 1785, 1798, and 1828, and our treaties with the Netherlands and with all countries of the civilized world.

This desire of our patriots and loyal American citizens to establish their relations with the other peoples and the other nations so firmly upon right and justice that there could be no cavil or question by such other peoples of the declared right of the United States to maintain its own policy and insist upon its claim when it spoke with reference to affairs upon this hemisphere has been in recent years apparently mistaken by some writers, publicists, and public men for that enlightened American patriotism which made this country and which maintained it in its power and in its own self-respect and in the respect of the world to the point where it could make its spirit, as evinced in these treaties and in its ordinary dealings with the other nations of the world, understood and regarded.

This spirit of the American people could not have made itself understood nor respected nor regarded by the other nations and peoples of the world had not they understood, as they now understand, irrespective of the high position of he who may proclaim himself as the custodian of the heart and the mouthpiece of the sentiment of the American people, that supporting this spirit, creating it, sustaining it, is that American patriotism of Washington, of Jefferson, or of the fathers and all our great men down to and including Theodore Roosevelt.

The President of the United States in his recent address to the Senate, when he laid before that body the instrument which is designated as the treaty of peace which we are requested to ratify as the end of the war between this country and Germany, spoke most beautifully and eloquently of our duty to humanity in Europe, Asia, and Africa, and demanded to know of us whether we would "break the heart of the world." But in listening to this most beautiful appeal I was impressed particularly with that portion of the paragraph third to the last in the printed copy of his speech in which he uses the following language:

> America may be said to have just reached her majority as a world power. It was almost exactly 21 years ago that the results of the War with Spain put us unexpectedly in possession of rich islands on the other side of the world and brought us into association with other Governments in the control of the West Indies. It was regarded as a sinister and ominous thing by the statesmen of more than one European chancellery that we should have extended our power beyond the confines of our continental dominions. They were accustomed to think of new neighbors as a new menace, of rivals as watchful enemies. There were persons amongst us at home who looked with deep disapproval and avowed anxiety on such extensions of our national authority over distant islands and over peoples whom they feared we might exploit, not serve and assist. But we have not exploited them. And our dominion has been a menace to no other nation. We redeemed our honor to the utmost in our dealings with Cuba. She is weak but absolutely free; and it is her trust in us that makes her free. Weak peoples everywhere stand ready to give us any authority among them that will assure them a like friendly oversight and direction. They know that there is no ground for fear in receiving us as their mentors and guides. Our isolation was ended 20 years ago; and now fear of us is ended also, our counsel and association sought after and desired.

Mr. President, to me it seemed, and subsequent consideration of the entire address has but confirmed the belief, that the President did not realize that this paragraph of his address was an absolute and unqualified answer in the negative to the appeal which he was making to the Senate of the United States, or through it to some of the people of the United States.

I call upon the President himself and upon the Senators in this body to consider that while we had truly gained the respect of all the world and the confidence of all the nations, great and small, through our dealings with them subsequent to the Spanish-American War, in the performance of our pledge to Cuba, in our care of the people of Porto Rico, in our consideration for and generosity toward the people in the Philippines, in our dealings with the people of Asia, with whom we have been thrown into more close social and commercial contact by virtue of our retention of the Philippines; that this confidence and respect of the other peoples, because of the facts cited by the President, was gained under the American spirit of government; the American spirit of fair dealing with other nations; the American spirit of justice and generosity and of service which has grown with this country as the country itself grew, and which was, is, and shall be the product of the American policy of no entangling political alliances with the peoples of any other nation or nations under the sun.

The President's attention is called to the fact that, as he so well said, the people of other nations were accustomed to look with well-founded suspicion upon closer contact of any kind with other nations because of the general selfish practice of the nations of the world to exploit new people and new countries and selfishly to administer them for their own benefit and selfishly to treat with other nations with whom they were thrown from time to time in close or closer contact.

And then the President appeals to the Senate of the United States to join him in overturning the American policy of 140 years, in undermining every influence with other nations which that policy has created and maintained; in deadening the influence of American patriotism here at home; in rendering obsolete the word patriotism in our vocabulary; in joining this Nation, now possessing the confidence, respect, and admiration of the people of the other nations, won through so many years of travail and toil and struggle and sacrifice, in a bond of alliance, hard and fast, with the very selfish nations who have caused our conduct to stand out in such brilliant contrast, in a council where our freedom of action hereafter will be controlled by the vote of eight of these nations referred to by the President, whose administration of colonies or new countries or more intimate contact with other peoples have led such other people to expect only exploitation and selfish administration.

I have referred to our treaties inaugurating and pursuing our American policy from the days of 1782 down to the present time, but I have not nor shall I attempt to enumerate or discuss these various treaties in detail. I think, however, that the people of the United States who do not understand what has been the trend of our former negotiations and who are now being assured that this present proposed treaty will create the dawn of a new international era of peace should understand once for all that this country has 25 or more arbitration treaties with all the great and small civilized countries; that under the terms of these treaties we submit to arbitration all questions which may arise involving construction of treaties or points of international law, or any other matter or matters of dispute whatsoever, excepting always the Monroe doctrine and purely American questions, such as immigration and the rights of third parties.

Hearing, as they do, that this proposed treaty provides for the settlement of international disputes, the people of the United States who have not given thought or study to the subject might think that the Wilsonian era has indeed inaugurated a new policy in the history of this country.

Arbitration treaties exist now not only between this country and other nations but between practically each of the other nations, one with the other, and a general Hague arbitration agreement was signed and ratified by practically all the civilized countries of the world.

I have heard from the lips of the President of the United States, at least through the reading of one of his addresses, I believe to the Daughters of the American Revolution, that the fathers who founded this country and the captains who steered the ship of state through the shoals and turbulent waters of national and international troubled seas until recent days had no such complicated questions to meet and decide as were now to be considered, even before this country entered the European war as a belligerent.

I might remind the people of the country that during the progress of the war and before we became belligerents a German cruiser ship of war sunk the William P. Frye, a vessel owned by American citizens, and that upon the request being made by the President of the United States to the Imperial German Government that reparation for such destruction should be made, the German Government immediately admitted this liability under the treaty of amity and commerce entered into in 1782 between the Emperor of Prussia and the United States of America represented by Pennsylvania's great citizen, the diplomat and patriot, Benjamin Franklin.

I might further remind the President and the people of the United States that upon one point of the controversy, that is, what body or tribunal under the terms of this treaty had jurisdiction to determine the value of the destroyed property, the German Government suggested that this matter should be submitted to The Hague tribunal and that such suggestion was immediately accepted on behalf of the people of the United States by its President, Woodrow Wilson.

American patriotism has been a development growing with the growth of the Nation and developing with the recognition of the fact that this was originally intended to be and is now one great Nation of free people.

During the discussions leading up to and following the adoption of our present Constitution and form of government many sincere and able Americans held to the principle that loyalty and patriotism were first due to the States which formed the Union.

For many years after the formation of this Government, able men, of whom John C. Calhoun was one, if not the most prominent, example, announced and endeavored to fix upon our policy the doctrine that each State of the Union had reserved to itself the right to ignore and refuse to enforce within its own boundaries any act of the Congress of the United States which, in the opinion of such individual State, was not for the best interest of the people of the State or which was not enacted under the direct powers given by the people of such State to the Federal Government.

A great majority of those who held to this doctrine were, in so far as foreign relations were concerned, as patriotic American citizens as those who contended for the absolute supremacy in the United States of the Federal Government in all matters within its sphere, whether enacted, if laws, under direct power delegated or necessarily implied.

This coterie of statesmen, loyal, as I have said, and patriotic in the true sense of the word where patriotism means love of country, in any matter concerning other countries than the United States, were, nevertheless, sincere in their belief that the Constitution of this Union was simply a compact or covenant of sovereign States for their mutual protection and the conservation of their mutual interests and that the Federal Union in itself was not intended to be a great, powerful Government of and within itself.

Those patriots who held to the contrary doctrine were led by John Marshall and Daniel Webster, and to me it would seem that many persons might now with great profit read the debates between Calhoun and Hayne upon the one part and Webster and others during what has been known as the "States Rights" debates extending over a long period of years.

It was pointed out by Calhoun and others of his school of thought that there was no provision in the Constitution itself by which or through which the Federal Government was directly empowered to enforce its laws within the States as against the opposition of the people or of the authorities of such State.

This argument was answered by Webster in most masterly speeches and arguments confuting the contention that the State could remain in the Union at all and defy the enforcement within its boundaries of any law or act of the Federal Government itself.

Webster admitted, as all must admit, that such an inherent right remained if the State chose to resort to an armed overthrow of the Government and could finally succeed in such effort. In other words, it was admitted that the right of the rebellion as set forth in the Declaration of Independence was the inherent right of man. It was denied that any State could nullify or refuse to obey any act of the Federal Government while remaining in the Union.

The rebellion was the natural child of the doctrine of nullification, and despite the fact that various States had reserved the right of withdrawal when they ratified the Federal Constitution, when secession was followed by rebellion and war, the ultimate arbiter in all like disputes decided against the right of withdrawal and secession, and such decision has now the unanimous approval of the men of all countries, and certainly of all of the citizens of this great Federal Union.

And yet the arguments to which the Senate has recently listened, coming from the majority of the supporters of the proposed peace treaty and constitution of the league of nations, has been exactly in line with the arguments used by those who would have destroyed by limitation the powers of the Federal Government prior to 1861.

Word for word, line for line, and sentence for sentence, almost identical arguments have been used by those within this Chamber who would have the constitution of the league of nations adopted as it is written when they have undertaken to meet the arguments of those who insisted that the proposed constitution of the league not only created limitations of the powers of the sovereignty of this Government but constituted in various articles unconstitutional delegations of the power delegated to the Senate of the United States by the people of the United States.

Several of the Senators, and particularly one of them, within the last 10 days has attempted to class opponents of the league in this Chamber as "reactionaries," because of the fact that they refused to have this country ratify the league articles as they stand, and at least one Senator has referred to them as of the school of those who opposed the adoption of the Constitution.

Such an argument, of course, is unworthy of serious consideration, for upon the face of it it bears its own refutation.

Those who are opposing the delegation of the supreme powers of this great Federal Union to a political body, overwhelming control whereof shall be vested in the other nations joining the league, are of the school of thought of John Marshall and Webster. Those who are favoring the league provisions as they stand are the natural intellectual descendants and members of the same school who, prior to 1860, sought to limit in every way possible the Federal powers and who maintained the right then, as their intellectual descendants are now, maintaining it, to nullify the acts of the Government which they themselves established. They claim that we can enter the league and then nullify its orders by declining to enforce them, and that we can do this without reserving such right in the ratifying resolution and having such reservation accepted by the other parties to the proposed league.

As the Federal Government established in 1789 under the constitution of 1787 was not a party to the Constitution under which it was created, neither is the league of nations itself a party to the treaty which seeks to create such league.

Measured by all the definitions of a government, the league, if constituted, is a government. The league articles themselves limit the sovereignty of the various members joining the league, exactly as the constitutional provisions limited directly the rights of the various States forming this Federal Union in the matter of making treaties, of making war or declaring war, of interference with interstate commerce, and so forth.

The Constitution of the United States not only limits the powers of the different States but of itself, under the acts passed in pursuance thereof and of the treaties made under its authority or in pursuance of the Constitution, operates directly upon the people themselves.

Under the constitution of the league of nations and the proposed treaty, of which it is a part, the council and assembly of the league of nations, while dealing more generally through their acts, resolutions, and orders, with the States constituting the league, yet has every element of sovereignty and government in that it also deals directly with peoples.

It deals directly with the people of the Saar Basin. It deals directly with the people of Poland and Germany for an untold or unfixed number of years in the creation of and control over certain districts lying between the boundaries of those two countries yet to be fixed.

It deals directly with the Rhine Provinces and the inhabitants thereof.

It deals directly with the people of the German overseas colonies who are ceded with their respective territories directly to the five "principal allied and associated powers," that is, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States, as will be seen by reference to articles 120 and others of the treaty of peace and will be confirmed by consideration of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, particularly in the insular and other case.

Contrary to the impression in the minds of many people, the German overseas colonies are not turned over directly to the league, or the council, or assembly, or to the members of the league, but to the five powers which I have named.

Under the vague provisions of Article 22 of the proposed league constitution, it will be seen that, while it is the apparent purpose to turn such colonies over to individual powers as mandatories, the rules and regulations for the governing of the people of such colonies, and those hereafter to be placed at the disposition of the same or other individual powers, are under the direct control and supervision of the council of the league of nations itself.

In terms, the treaty and the league articles do not provide for military protection of the colonies. The five powers or the league would have that power and duty.

The league itself shall have general supervision over the trade in arms and munitions of the countries in which control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest; it will have control and general supervision over the execution of agreements with reference to the traffic in women and children and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs; it will have control over all international bureaus and commissions.

I desire to say that I am not objecting to such control as is herein provided being vested, as at present it is vested, in bureaus or commissions, nor to such bureaus or commissions being consolidated; but I am simply calling attention to this provision to emphasize the fact that this league constitution forms a government with supreme control beyond that of each or all the other governments of the world with regard to certain matters.

Without attempting to review each of the different articles, I may say shortly that article 2 provides that the action of the league shall be effected through the instrumentality of the assembly and council with a permanent secretariat.

This article, with article 3 and article 4, constitute an assembly and council, the legislative and administrative bodies of a great supergovernment, while other articles, some of which have been fully discussed and others but glanced at, outline directly or by necessary implication the functioning, both in the legislative and administrative way, of the council of the league as the actual governing body of the league, leaving to the council itself its method of organization in so far as the election of a permanent or temporary president and other officers is concerned.

I have in the only speech which I have heretofore made on this subject called attention to the words of article 3, wherein, when the assembly is in session, it may "deal with any matter within the sphere of action of the league," or (and these are the broad terms of its general jurisdiction) "any matter affecting the peace of the world."

The same general jurisdiction is given by article 4 to the council of the league, and there is no limitation whatsoever with reference to either "dealing with" or how they shall "deal with" any matter which, in their judgment, may "effect the peace of the world."

This power is delegated to the council and the assembly by each of the members of the league ratifying its constitution, and if such delegation is constitutional, then, in so far as this country is concerned, either the assembly or council having dealt with such matter, it would become the duty of the executive officer or of the administrative officers of the United States of America to put in force here the action of the council or of the assembly thereupon. Under our Constitution, with its three distinct departments of government, the executive is that department which executes the laws or puts in effect such laws or necessary measures.

This construction, of course, applies with even more force with reference to articles 10, 11, 15, 16, and 17 of the constitution of the proposed league.

In the discussion of the armed-neutrality resolutions and other measures before our declaration of war I cited the action of the constitutional convention and the debates thereupon in the matter of the adoption of the provision that the Congress of the United States should "declare war." I then pointed out the distinction not only as understood generally but as followed in the convention and as since followed in practice in the United States between the congressional power and duty to declare war and the right of the President of the United States, as the Chief Executive, to wage or "make" war.

To illustrate the point which I am now touching upon, if we will examine article 16 of the treaty it will be found that any country making war upon any other country in violation of its league agreements shall be considered to have declared or to be waging war against all the members of the league. If we can delegate that authority, and we clearly attempt to do so, then as clearly must the fact be established that the recommendation to be made by the council to the several Governments as to what effective military, naval, or air forces the members of the league shall severally contribute for the protection of the covenants would be made only to the executive department of this Government. For the sake of argument, granting the right to delegate this power, then the executive department of this Government, and that department alone, could, and in my judgment it would be its duty to, immediately follow such recommendation and use such portion of our land and naval or air forces, or either, as were required by such recommendation.

It must be borne in mind that, generally speaking, that is to say, unless there are clear terms of limitation, the word "may" in international law is understood as meaning "must," and a recommendation under such circumstances would undoubtedly be construed by any international tribunal as an order.

The Government, that is to say, the Congress, as a portion of such Government, under the decisions of our own tribunals, could have, and would have, no voice whatsoever in the control of the executive action in this matter except possibly through legislative control over the funds for moving land, naval, or air forces.

To my mind it is equally as clear that the refusal of Congress under such circumstances to provide the funds, in event the President has not in his control such necessary funds, or the failure or refusal of the President himself to act, would in either event be an act of rebellion against the league government and would justify war upon us.

There is no question in my mind that under article 11, granting for the sake of argument that we can constitutionally vest the league with the power to take any "action" that it may deem "wise and effectual" to safeguard the peace of the nations, that the governing body of the league can declare war or declare a State to be in rebellion or declare that armed protection is necessary for some colony or country under mandate, and direct measures to be taken by each of the members of the league, and that such measures would be not only directed to the executive of each such member government, but that under our form of government it would be the duty of the President of the United States, without calling upon Congress, to make war in enforcing the orders of the league.

I have heard statements made upon the floor that the Supreme Court of the United States had declared the power of Congress to set aside or abrogate or refuse to enforce the provisions of and thus annul any treaty to which the United States was a party.

Of course, the Supreme Court of the United States must in cases arising within the United States, or within the jurisdiction of such court, where arising under our municipal law, be governed by such municipal law, although in conflict with treaty rights. Time and again, however, the court has pointed out the distinction between the international obligation of such treaty and the municipal force of such treaty when in conflict with the subsequent act of Congress.

Never has the Supreme Court of the United States held that, as to the international obligation, an act of Congress could annul it, in so far as the contentions of other parties to it are concerned, or could prevent diplomatic complications or responsibility under international law and the treaty provisions, ensuing to us. In fact, not only have our courts held in every case where considered that such complications might arise and such responsibility be asserted, but the other nations of the earth have invariably declined to recognize the doctrine that a congressional act relieved us from treaty responsibility where the government with which we had the treaty either directly for itself or for one of its nationals chose to insist upon the terms of the treaty or upon the performance of international obligations.

It will be only necessary to cite one or two instances where foreign Governments have asserted this principle to establish the point.

In the letter of the British ambassador to the Secretary of State, under date of February 27, 1913, referring to the claim of our State Department that, even if the tolls-exemption act of itself conflicted with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, yet at the time of the British protest no injury had arisen of which Great Britain could complain, said:

> From this view His Majesty's Government feel bound to express their dissent. They conceive that international law or usage does not support the doctrine; that the passing of the statute in contravention of the treaty right offers no ground of complaint for the infraction of that right; and that the nation which holds that its treaty rights have been so infringed or brought into question by the denial that they exist must, before protesting and seeking a means of determining the point at issue, wait until some further action violating those rights in a concrete instance has been taken. * * *
> In their view the act of Congress * * * was in itself, and apart from any action which may be taken under it, inconsistent with the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. * * * In their opinion the mere conferring by Congress of power * * * amounts to the denial of the right of British shipping to equality of terms. * * *
> His Majesty's Government holds that the difference which exists between the two Governments is clearly one which falls within the meaning of article 1 of the arbitration treaty of 1908.

It will thus be seen that Great Britain at least claims that any act of Congress, whether enforced or not, which act of Congress Great Britain herself may conclude to be a denial of something which she claims to be a treaty right, is a matter for her consideration and, even over our contention to the contrary, a matter for arbitration, or, if the constitution of the league should be ratified, would be a matter for the council to decide in event arbitration was not sought or submitted to.

Followed to its logical conclusion, this would mean that all acts of the Congress of the United States would be subject to an exactly similar claim by any country a member of the league, and it would become a matter for the eventual consideration of the council as to whether such act either operated when enforced as a nullification of the treaty provision or constituted a denial of some treaty right, although not put in operation or effect.

In other words, this Congress can not sit here in its regular session and pass any act hereafter without the understanding that every nation of the world a party to the league of nations document has the right to inspect, pass upon, and drag us into an international court to ascertain the meaning of an act of Congress, although it may be a purely domestic matter; though it may be only for our municipal government.

Again, to cite another instance, concerning the matter of contention during this debate, Japan, in a letter to her ambassador here under date of June 10, 1914, referring to the denial of the right of the Japanese to hold lands in California, said:

> Among the more important pending questions that confronted me when I assumed charge of this department was the issue resulting from the enactment last year of the Legislature of California respecting alien property ownership. The measure, as you are aware, undertook in effect to draw a distinction in the matter of such ownership between aliens belonging to different races. The avowed purpose of the law was, on the one hand, to annul the then existing right of ownership so far as Japanese subjects were concerned and, on the other, to continue the right in favor of aliens of the white and black races.
> I have given the subject my most serious consideration and am consequently well satisfied that the enactment in question is not only in disregard of the letter and spirit of the existing treaty between Japan and the United States of America, but is essentially unfair and invidiously discriminatory against my countrymen and inconsistent as well with the sentiment of amity and good neighborhood which has always presided over the relations between the two countries. Nor can I escape the conviction that the said enactment which was intended to have international effect is also in excess of the authority of the State of California for the reason that the separate States of the United States are, internationally speaking, wholly unknown and entirely without responsibility. In any case the Imperial Government are confident that such action as complained of stands without historical parallel, and they are happy to believe that the legislation in question forms no part of the general policy of the Federal Government, but is the outcome of unfortunate local conditions. I therefore fully concur in the views which you, in pursuance of instructions from my predecessor, presented to the honorable the Secretary of State on the subject.

The same thing applies to every convention suggested by Mr. Bryan for the settlement of this difficulty, as we submit it to no convention between the two nations. Well might Japan enter the league of nations, although her insistence upon what she calls the racial clause was not agreed to, because under the terms of the league itself every question which Japan has with the United States, both as to immigration and as to racial discrimination, as to the laws in the different States, is distinctly reserved to be decided by the council of the league of nations in event arbitration fails.

The letter continues:

> I also cordially appreciate the motives which in the interest of international conciliation and good will induced Baron Makino to give favorable consideration to the idea of concluding a convention regarding the matter. But the project, as it stands at the present time, instead of composing existing misunderstandings, would, I fear, tend to create new difficulties. Accordingly, you are instructed to inform Mr. Bryan that the Imperial Government are disinclined to continue the negotiations looking to the conclusion of a convention on the lines of the project which has been under discussion, but that they prefer to recur to the correspondences which were interrupted by the ineffective negotiations, and that they will now look for an answer to the note which you handed to Mr. Bryan on the 26th of August last, hoping that in a renewal of the study of the case a fundamental solution of the question at issue may happily be found.

Such a question being raised by Japan, it would be futile for the United States to offer before the council or any arbitration commission the defense attempted to be set up that the Federal Government, not being able to control the State of California in this matter, was itself not therefore responsible in event the council or arbitration commission decided that the act of the State of California was, as claimed by Japan, a violation of her treaty provisions, or a violation of international law, or that the question of fact raised by Japan should be considered by the commission or by the council.

In either of the instances cited, the United States being a party to the dispute, would have no vote in the decision of the council upon the subject.

Having delegated, granting for the sake of argument that we can delegate, the authority to the council or to the commission to consider such matters, the orders in the premises as made by the council would be directed to the executive department of this Government and under our obligations as a member of the council, we must obey same immediately or be in rebellion against the league with all the consequences which such an act of rebellion might visit upon us.

I will not dwell longer at this time upon the proposition which I have been discussing.

Mr. President, in view of some correspondence which has recently been published in the newspapers, and in view of various articles emanating from the author of that correspondence, I want to digress here for a moment in closing the discussion as to the political character of the supergovernment which we are proposing to establish, to call attention to the inconsistency of members and supporters of the league to enforce peace in their attitude now in support of the league, the constitution of which is before us.

The League to Enforce Peace was formed for a purpose; it had a platform; it published it to the world, and proceeded with such a propaganda to secure support for it as has never before been witnessed in this country. That proposition, so earnestly insisted upon by Mr. Taft, its president, was the establishment of an international court of justice, the exact opposite of a political legislative body. Therefore, I could readily understand the situation when I saw in the press a few days since that Mr. Taft criticized the President of the United States for his dislike of courts. It is well understood that the assistance of the President of the United States before he departed for Europe was sought by Mr. Taft and the League to Enforce Peace for their propaganda, and the President failed to give it. The platform of principles of the League to Enforce Peace, of which Mr. Taft is the president, is as follows:

We believe it to be desirable for the United States to join a league of nations binding the signatories to the following:

First. All justiciable questions arising between the signatory powers, not settled by negotiation, shall, subject to the limitations of treaties, be submitted to a judicial tribunal for hearing and judgment, both upon the merits and upon any issue as to its jurisdiction of the question.

Second. All other questions arising between the signatories and not settled by negotiation shall be submitted to a council of conciliation for hearing, consideration, and recommendation.

Mr. President, it is not for me to say that the birthright of the League to Enforce Peace has been traded for a mess of pottage, but it is possibly well enough that I should read the trade which they have made. Article 14 of the constitution of the league of nations provides:

The council shall formulate and submit to the members of the league for adoption plans for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice. The court shall be competent to hear and determine any dispute of an international character which the parties thereto submit to it. The court may also give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to it by the council or by the assembly.

Mr. President, as to any question which may be raised concerning the league or as to any question in which the league or the council may be interested, there is not even given to the league of nations or to the assembly of the league or to the council of the league the jurisdiction, power, or authority which we have given to the Supreme Court of the United States here over our own Federal Government. This court which it is proposed to establish hereafter may act simply in an advisory capacity.

It is not for me to criticize—for I have no interest in it—the action of those conducting the affairs of the League to Enforce Peace for the use of the money which they have had in their possession. A simple comment is sufficient. Under this platform they sought here in the city of Washington subscriptions for their propaganda, and, as will be seen by reference to the columns of the press of this city, in 1916 in three days they secured $348,000 in cash or practically in cash, for the use of the League to Enforce Peace in its propaganda. As to what they have done with it or how much they have since collected I have no knowledge. This is a matter published in the press. My point is simply that it was collected for an entirely different purpose—for the establishment of a great international court to which nations should submit questions of international law, exactly as we submit questions to the Supreme Court of the United States here in our own country, and that we should abide by the decisions of that court.

Mr. President, I, for one, stand here now prepared to vote for any such agreement at any time. The United States has never failed, it has never refused to submit to arbitration, and to abide by arbitration, to submit to a court and to abide by its decisions, and it never will. Now, we are dragged into a political combination with the other nations of the world, the "selfish nations of the world" to whom the President of the United States refers.

I have already spoken of the difference of opinion, and of two schools of thought in this country upon the powers of the Federal Union and the powers and rights of the States. Another line of division in thought was clearly marked for a short period only, under the administration of Andrew Jackson.

It was maintained by Gen. Jackson and his friends in asserting the authority of the executive department of this Government that the same should be regarded as a unit; that is, that all the executive officers should be bound to obey the commands and execute the orders of the President and be amenable to him and he responsible for them.

Prior to his administration, it had been contended that such officers were bound to observe and obey the Constitution and laws, subject to the general superintendence of the President "and each responsible by impeachment and to the tribunals of justice for injuries inflicted upon private citizens," as was said by Henry Clay in a speech in Hanover County, Va., on June 27, 1840.

Gen. Jackson even went to the extent of claiming that the Constitution and laws of the United States were to be executed as he understood them; that he, being a sworn officer, must carry the laws into effect according to his sense of their meaning, and so forth.

No other President has, in so far as I know, in similar language suggested such an interpretation of executive duty and executive rights; but in his "Constitutional Government," in the United States, the Hon. Woodrow Wilson has announced without qualifications, simply and plainly, that this Government of ours is a "government of men" and not a "government of laws." He has stated, in effect, in commenting upon this proposition, that Washington, Jefferson and Madison and Jay and Hamilton and the other framers of our Constitution and the founders of our Government, did not understand the character of the Government which they had formed. He claims that they thought that, being familiar with Montesquien's "Spirit of the Laws," they were framing a Government according to what Mr. Wilson pleases to designate as the "Newtonian" theory, while he, then Mr. Wilson, now President Wilson, asserts that the Government which they formed was after the "Darwinian" theory, whatever that may be.

It is following this, Mr. Wilson's discovery of the mistake of of the fathers of our Government that he asserts the doctrine that this is a government of men and not a government of laws; that the Massachusetts Bill of Rights "to the end that this shall be a government of laws and not a government of men," was not adopted into our form of government; that, in fact, there could be no such government as that of men and not of laws.

In this one matter, at least, President Wilson has followed Dr. Wilson most consistently. Bearing in mind this conclusion of President Wilson, one can readily understand some of his acts; some of his statements and at least one of his appeals, which, without such realization of President Wilson's theories, have not been understood by many citizens of the United States.

For instance, in Mr. Wilson's appeal prior to the last election to the voters of the country to elect a Democratic House and a Democratic Senate, or else he would not be so well able to carry out his policies abroad, and so forth, Mr. Wilson was undoubtedly sincere in the belief that this was a government of men, of whom he was the duly chosen leader, and he was equally sincere in the opinion that the people of the United States realized this fact fully, and was undoubtedly astounded when they did not grant his request.

Undoubtedly Mr. Wilson thought there must have been some misunderstanding of his plea to the people which caused them to vote as they did, because he went to Europe insisting upon every occasion that he knew the heart and the spirit and voiced the demands of the American people, and that in their name he insisted upon writing into the treaty the constitution of the league of nations.

Undoubtedly he was again astounded when upon his temporary return from Europe he found that certain Members of the Senate could not agree to approve nor bind themselves to ratify the proposed constitution of the league.

I give the President credit for being entirely sincere in his construction of our form and principle of government, and yet I refuse to believe that the majority of the people of the United States agree in such construction. I believe that they rather adopt the theory of Webster and other great Americans that this is a "government of laws and not a government of men."

I believe that the mass of the people think as Webster thought when he said that "whatever government is not a government of laws is a despotism, let it be called what it may."

I give the President credit for absolute and entire sincerity in his theory, because I have seen that he has impressed such theory upon the representatives of his party, at least in the Congress of the United States, and I know that he has impressed it upon as many newspaper followers throughout the country.

Thus, therefore, we may understand the otherwise somewhat puzzling proposition insisted upon so consistently—and I had almost said vociferously—during the debate in this body, that anyone who disagrees with any word or line or who cares to dot an "i" or cross a "t" in the proposed constitution of the league or in the peace treaty as written must be guided entirely by "political partisanship" and the desire to make political capital through opposition to the President or must be guided by personal enmity to the President himself.

If I could not give credit for sincerity to those Senators who have been pursuing this line of denunciation, I could offer to myself no possible excuse for their supreme egotism in arrogating to themselves the sincerity, patriotism, and statesmanship in their support of the league provisions as they stand and the treaty provisions as they are written.

. This line of thought which the President's overwhelming ability and dominating personality has impressed upon his political followers gives them an excuse not only for abandoning but for uttering sentiments diametrically opposed to the arguments they used in 1912 in objecting to the proposed arbitration treaties offered by Mr. Taft because such treaties contained a provision for a commission, which commission, it was insisted, might pass upon questions to be arbitrated and thus deprive the Senate of one of its constitutional functions.

This conviction, so impressed upon his party followers, justifies their contention now that there should be no reservation in or amendments to the present treaty, when in March, 1912, their then leader, Senator Bacon, followed by every Democrat then in the Senate, many of whom are now members, among whom I will only mention Senators Hitchcock of Nebraska, Williams of Mississippi, Smith of Georgia, Smith of South Carolina, Swanson of Virginia, Fletcher of Florida, Pomerene of Ohio, and so forth, voted for the amendment offered by Senator Bacon in words as follows:

Provided, That the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the said treaty with the understanding, to be made a part of such ratification, that the treaty does not authorize the submission to arbitration of any question which affects the admission of aliens into the United States, or the admission of aliens to the educational institutions of the several States, or the territorial integrity of the several States or of the United States, or concerning the question of the alleged indebtedness or monied obligation of any State of the United States, or any question which depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions commonly described as the Monroe doctrine or other purely governmental policy.

Joined at that time by some of the Senators who yet remain upon this side of the Chamber, this amendment to the treaties was then adopted by a vote of 46 to 36.

If it proves a matter of further interest, I may quote from some of the illuminating speeches made during this debate by some of those Senators upon the other side, whose names I have mentioned, who then upheld the honor of the United States and gloried in its isolation and damned he who would either offer this country as a sacrifice in an entangling alliance or who would suggest that the Government of the United States itself and particularly this great Senate body should be deprived in any respect of its powers under the Constitution of the United States.

We have seen and heard evidence not only of propaganda throughout the United States in favor of the league for universal peace, but there is no questioning the fact that aside from the well-organized propaganda in that direction there does exist in the minds of a great majority of the people of the United States and of the world the keenest desire that some means should be discovered and worked out by which such wars as that supposed to have been ended when Germany affixed her signature to this treaty should be rendered impossible of repetition in the future.

Such desire has been expressed from time to time by the people of the earth since the days of Confucius. Such an overwhelming desire of the people of the world is accounted responsible for the faith of the primitive Christians in the doctrine that there will be a kingdom of God on earth which would last for a period of from 400 to 1,000 years. This idea or doctrine, known as that of the millennium, has come down to us, to be revived from time to time, and is really responsible to a great extent for the sincere belief of hundreds of thousands, aye, of millions possibly, of human beings now on earth that it is possible to legislate good into man; that it is possible by covenants and agreements made between nations from time to time to prevent wars in the future and to compel all men to live together in brotherly love and in harmony, without regard to the fact that some of these men are of one color and some of another; that some are of one religion and some are of another; that some speak one language which four-fifths of the other inhabitants of the world are not able to understand.

Many most excellent people do not understand fully the fundamental psychological and not-to-be-disputed fact, lost sight of by the chiliasts of every age, that the mere form of government under which the people may temporarily live and do business does not necessarily mean that such people entertain the same idea of the spirit of government or the duty of the government to its citizens and of the duty of citizens to their government which people of another race or another country or of other training entertain who live under a similar constitution or form of government.

The people of Germany were confederated together under a constitution and with two legislative and one executive department of their Government. Some of the constituent elements of the German confederation were the old Hanse free towns which in the fourteenth century practically controlled the commrece of the earth.

The President of the United States fell into the common error when he insisted time after time that the German people were not responsible for the late war, that it was merely their rulers who were responsible, and when he insisted in effect that we would only deal with them when they had overthrown their rulers.

And now he has dealt with them possibly more harshly than any other conquered people were ever dealt with by a civilized conqueror.

The President of the United States has seemed to think that because Mexico has the form of a republican representative government based upon that of the United States that necessarily if the people of Mexico had an opportunity, or the great submerged 80 per cent had an opportunity in that country, they would consider their Government from the same standpoint occupied by the citizens of the United States in considering ours.

He has made no allowance for thousands of years of heredity as affecting the thought, the ideas, and the principles of the various people of the earth. He has fallen into the error so common to idealists and theorists and reformers of overlooking precedent in dealing with people and with facts and has vainly imagined, as his followers now vainly imagine, that by simply entering into a covenant to keep the peace and adopting a constitution for the government of the world, that this one country of ours can by such agreement bring about the millennium on earth.

I know that to the minds of many in this Senate the suggestion that precedent be considered meets with no favorable response, but merely with the cry that one making such a suggestion is a reactionary, and yet I desire to call attention for a moment to the only precedent in modern times which we have in full historical, definite form, and that is to the constitution of the Holy Alliance adopted in 1815 and referred to some time since in the Senate by Senator JOHNSON of California.

Remember that not only Europe but the world had been at war for approximately 20 years when the quadruple alliance of Russia, Prussia, Austria, Great Britain, later to become the quintuple alliance by the adhesion of France, was formed in Vienna, to be followed later by, and not to be confounded with, the Holy Alliance formed by Russia, Prussia, and Austria under the leadership of Alexander the First of Russia.

Remember that not only all the countries of Europe which have been engaged in the recent war were parties to the wars ending in 1815, but that Holland, not a party to the war which we hope has now just closed, Denmark, at times Norway and Sweden, and Spain had been involved, and even Switzerland disturbed, and that the United States itself had been at war with Great Britain while the Latin American countries on this continent had also been in revolution against the parent Government of Spain, and then prior to the exile of Napoleon, as now after the armistice of 1918, the peoples of the earth demanded, as now they pray, that wars should cease and that peace should reign forevermore.

Just stop and think of this for a moment, Senators. We have heard here time and time and time again that the present war is a world war; that the world has never before witnessed such a war. In points of numbers of men engaged in the different armies that may be true. In point of money expended in carrying on the war that may be true. In point of numbers of States engaged it is not true. In the Napoleonic wars of 1797 up to 1813 every country of the world was in one way or another directly involved in the entente, and none stood out. As I pointed out, even the countries of Latin America and this country itself were then, as now, at war. The same demand always goes up that war shall cease. Just as sincere and honest men attempted to provide methods by which war should be prevented then, as any man is honest or sincere who is engaged in the present effort.

The conception of the creation of the Holy Alliance by the great chiliast of that age, Alexander the First, was not his conception. He was as fanatically sincere in demanding peace as was any man who ever lived. He became convinced that Napoleon was anti-Christ; that the time had come for the establishment of the millenium; and under the influence of the good Moravians, of Madam von Krudener, and others, he invited his brothers of Prussia and Austria to join him in establishing the reign of Christ on earth, to continue for a thousand years, to bring about the millenium; and to that end to join in extending an invitation to all nations of Europe to adopt and enforce the provisions of the constitution of the Holy Alliance.

Under the influence of the struggle of free men for freedom in France, then temporarily crushed, the patriots of other nations and of kingdoms rose against their oppressors and sought to overthrow them or to extort from them a greater measure of self-government for the peoples, and being sincerely convinced that such internal conditions would threaten the peace of the world, a meeting of the members of the Holy Alliance was called for Troppau, and on the 19th of November, 1822, a protocol to the constitution of the Holy Alliance was adopted which was, in words, as follows:

States which have undergone a change of government due to revolution, the result of which threatens other States, ipso facto cease to be members of the European alliance and remain excluded from it until their situation gives guaranties for legal order and stability.

If, owing to such alterations, immediate danger threatens other States, the powers bind themselves, by peaceful means, or, if need be, by arms, to bring back the guilty State into the bosom of the great alliance.

I pause for a moment to read you the provisions of article 11 of the proposed constitution of the league of nations:

ARTICLE 2.

Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. In case any such emergency should arise the secretary general shall, on the request of any member of the league, forthwith summon a meeting of the council.

It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

Almost word for word the language of the Troppau protocol of 1822.

Under the provisions of the Troppau protocol, within a short time after its adoption, Austria, as mandatory for the alliance, overturned the liberal government in the two Sicilies, and France, as a mandatory for the alliance, overthrew the government of the Cortez and subverted the liberal constitution of 1812 in the Kingdom of Spain.

Russia had always been a friend of the United States, and during the period from 1815 until subsequent to the Spanish treaty of 1819 had acted upon more than one occasion as arbitrator of disputes between ourselves and other countries, or as our friend in diplomatically settling threatening disputes. Although she did not officially approach us with an invitation that we should join the alliance, it is well understood that certain officials of our Government or prominent Americans here were "sounded" by representatives of the Russian Emperor, only to discover that membership in such an alliance was not looked upon with favor here.

Castlereagh, prime minister of Great Britain, had refused to sign the constitution of the alliance or attend the meeting at Troppau, and thus England had not become a member, although the Prince Regent had expressed his adhesion to the principles announced. Yet Great Britain, wearied and worn by the years of war when she was engaged in breaking down Napoleon, felt that she could not defy the powers of the earth as she had defied Napoleon himself in the days of his supremacy, and hence was compelled to leave the Kingdom of Naples, the Kingdom of the two Sicilies, and the Cortez and the Government of Spain to their own resources, and stand by and see efforts for freedom in Europe crushed without daring to lift her voice or her hand in protest.

Finally, it remained for this young giant, this Nation, of all the others of the earth, to throw herself across the path of all of the conquering nations of Europe; and, through the voice of Jefferson and Monroe, to say to Russia, Prussia, Austria, Spain, and all the allied nations of the earth "thus far canst thou go and no farther," and "now and henceforth no nation of the Old World, or of any other hemisphere, can interfere with the Government or seize the territory of any country upon this hemisphere without dealing with the country of Washington, the United States of America."

And now, by another great chiliast, after a similar period to that preceding the formation of the Holy Alliance, we are requested—nay, we are commanded—to surrender our freedom, to yield our sovereignty, to subvert our Government, to become one of a league of nations, many worshipping no gods, or other gods, few among the peoples of the nations speaking our language, not one understanding the true patriotism of the United States nor the true spirit of our people nor the true form of our government.

We are asked to surrender that political freedom which of itself constitutes, out of all the forces known to man, the great force for freedom, for right, for justice—the unhampered, unswathed, untrammeled power of this great Nation of 110,000,000 people, governed under one law or form of government, breathing the same air of freedom, speaking with the same tongue, and worshipping the one God. Untrammeled, free to act, to strike as we have just struck in defense of ourselves and what our own Government stands for, and to aid in striking down the military power which threatened the people of all the earth, we, and we alone, except for the sympathy existing between us and those other nations who desire right and justice, can and will command the peace of the world.

Joined with the other people of the world in this so-called peace treaty, joined with those nations every one of whom we are told, even by the President, sat at the peace table insisting and insistent upon selfish rights or claims or readjustment of rights or claims, of international boundaries and of new boundaries; constituting only a fraction of the governing body of the league, unable within the league to impress ourselves and our ideas and to make our demands as we could out of it, because of the fact that we delegate to others the right to vote, eight votes to one against us in any matter of selfish interest in which they can unite; we have not only destroyed the Government of our fathers but, in my mind, we have committed a crime against the nations of the earth, against civilization itself, and retarded for more than a thousand years that reign of Christ which we all hope will eventually bring the people of the earth together.

And yet, entertaining these convictions as sincerely as some of us do, we are criticized for uttering a word in defense of them by imitators or followers of one who dreams and has not yet learned with Kipling that he must not make dreams his master and that, thinking, he must not make thoughts his aim.

To such Senators as have criticized the opponents of the proposed league as being merely captious critics or political opponents, rather than in my feeble words I would answer in the words of the great expounder of the Constitution, Daniel Webster:

Sir, I love liberty no less ardently than the gentleman, in whatever form she may have appeared in the progress of human history. As exhibited in the master states of antiquity, as breaking out again from amidst the darkness of the Middle Ages, and beaming on the formation of new communities in modern Europe, she has, always and everywhere, charms for me. Yet, sir, it is our own liberty, guarded by constitutions and secured by union; it is that liberty which is our paternal inheritance, it is our established, dear-bought, peculiar American liberty, to which I am chiefly devoted, and the cause of which I now mean, to the utmost of my power, to maintain and defend.

ADDITIONAL PAY FOR DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have filed with the Secretary of the Senate this afternoon a gigantic petition collected by the Hearst newspapers of the United States, containing 6,100,000 names, urging the Congress to pay to every honorably discharged soldier, sailor, and marine of the European war a sum equal to six months' pay. This petition, addressed to the Members of the Senate and the House, is as follows:

To Congressmen and Senators:

The National Legislature, of which you are an honored Member, voted to take young men away from their homes, from their work, asking them to sacrifice their immediate future if necessary, their lives.

That was necessary legislation. The Nation approved it and thanks you for it.

I ask you to use your influence now and see to it that these young men returning from war are justly treated. Give them the same consideration that is given to the bigger man who is dealing with the Government financially, while the little man was simply offering his life.

I urge you to vote for a bill that will guarantee to every soldier at least six months' full pay after he leaves the Army—little enough and far too little to do for men to whom the country owes so much.

Mr. President, I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). The petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INVESTIGATION OF HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I offer a resolution and ask that it be read. Before the reading, I wish to state that it is merely to cover probably an oversight in another resolution authorizing the District of Columbia Committee of the Senate to conduct an investigation into the high cost of living. They are now engaged in that investigation by virtue of a resolution reported out from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and passed, but some question has been raised by the proper officers of the Senate as to the sufficiency of that resolution. The chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses is here, and I believe he will make no objection to the immediate adoption of the resolution. I ask that the resolution be read and referred to that committee.

The resolution (S. Res. 150) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, or any subcommittee thereof, be directed to inquire into the question of prices, rents, or related subjects in the District of Columbia and report to the Senate thereon, together with their recommendation of any steps which they may deem it necessary to take with a view to remedying the conditions.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I had assumed that the report submitted several days ago covered this very subject, but some of the officials of the Senate have believed it does not, and with that in mind I report back the resolution favorably and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

PRICE FIXING OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. KIRBY. I offer a resolution, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 149) was read, as follows:

Resolution, That the Senate Judiciary Committee be, and it is hereby, instructed to report whether it is feasible, and if so, to report a bill providing adequately for the fixing of a maximum sale price of not less than 25 per cent less than the prevailing market price on all articles, products, and commodities, transported in interstate commerce, with a view to the reduction of the high cost of living.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

ADDITIONAL PAY FOR DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a moment ago the Senator from New York offered a petition, if I understood it correctly, signed by 100,000 people——

Mr. CALDER. Six million one hundred thousand.

Mr. THOMAS. Signed by 6,100,000 people?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. A petition asking for appropriate legislation giving to each soldier who served in the late war six months' pay. I will ask the Senator if he has made any estimate of what the aggregate sum would amount to which would be required if we should comply with the petition?

Mr. CALDER. I have not, but I will say, offhand, it would be somewhere in the neighborhood of $500,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is $220,000,000 shy. It would require $720,000,000. It occurred to me that perhaps the 6,000,000 people who signed the petition were unaware of the fact that we would have to increase our present burden of taxation at least that sum of money, and they would have to pay a great part of it.

Mr. President, it seems that we are beginning a course here which, if continued, will not only bankrupt the United States but will smear all over the record of patriotism and valor made by this Army with the sign of the dollar mark.

ADDITIONAL PAY FOR PRINTING OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Printing I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 5418) increasing the pay of printers and pressmen employed in the Government Printing Office, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

I wish to take just a moment to state the reason why I make the request. Perhaps I had better talk plainly to the Senate, so that Senators may know the situation. The printers, linotype operators, monotype keyboard operators, makers-up, copy editors, proof readers, bookbinders, and bookbinder machine operators in the Government Printing Office to-day are receiving 65 cents an hour. Such employees are paid outside, at the lowest, a dollar an hour, and some of them $1.25 an hour. The outside trade is taking them away from the Government Printing Office so fast that we can not keep up the printing required.

The requirements of the departments are such that we have got to secure more printers for the Government Printing Office or we shall be compelled to have a part of the printing done outside the Government Printing Office.

These employees are asking for $1 an hour. The bill proposes to pay 75 cents an hour, an increase from 65 to 75 cents.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. If I understood the Senator correctly, he stated that these printers are getting 65 cents an hour and are paying at the present time something over a dollar for sustenance for each 65 cents received. Is that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not say that. I said printers outside doing the same work are paid from $1 to $1.25 per hour.

Mr. THOMAS. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The outside trade is taking men away from the Government Printing Office so fast that it is impossible for us to keep printers in the Government Printing Office to do the required work.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, I think it has been demonstrated to us that whenever we do any outside work it costs largely more than when done by the Public Printer. It is for that reason, and that alone, and on account of the exigencies of the situation, that I am convinced, as I think is also the Senator from Utah, of the necessity for this increase.

Mr. SMOOT. I feel quite sure if we grant this 75 cents an hour, taking all the other questions into consideration, namely, the $240 bonus that will go to each one, whether the pay is or is not increased, together with 30 days' leave of absence and 20 per cent increase for overtime, we can maintain the number of employees at the Government Printing Office that will be necessary.

I believe that Senators know me well enough to conclude that I would not be here pleading for this increase unless it were absolutely necessary. It is for that reason, and that only, that I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. If it is not passed to-day, it can not go over to the House before their recess, as the House takes a recess to-morrow, and I should like to have it passed and signed before to-morrow afternoon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act the pay of all printers, printer linotype operators, printer monotype keyboard operators, makers-up, copy editors, proof readers, bookbinders, bookbinder-machine operators, and pressmen employed in the Government Printing Office shall be at the rate of 75 cents per hour for the time actually employed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not oppose the passage of this measure. I could not do so successfully if I made the attempt. I merely wish, however, to reiterate the assertion that I have made on every similar occasion since the war began. It is that immediately after legislation increasing the compensation of Government employees the price of all necessities of life will rise in a similar ratio, with the result that instead of giving relief, however greatly it may be needed, we have simply used the employees of the Government as a conduit to take money from the Treasury of the United States and put it into the pockets of the purveyors. This bill may result in keeping printers in Washington in the Government service who otherwise would go elsewhere, but that it will cure the difficulty as is claimed I absolutely deny.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator entirely upon that last proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. We are feeding an appetite for increased compensation in the vain hope that we can satisfy it. The appetite is a natural one, an unavoidable one, in view of existing conditions, but it is stimulated as the appetite of the inebriate is stimulated by the constant and increasing use of stimulants. We can no more overcome this problem of the high cost of living by an increase of compensation to employees of the Government than we can overcome the law of gravitation, and we might just as well try to repeal that natural law by a Federal statute as to attempt even to retard the progress of that inevitably recurring system of conduct by which prices adapt themselves to the means of the consumer.

The Senator from Utah, in his capacity as chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, within six months from now in all probability will be here with a similar bill designed to keep the printers for the Government in Washington, because, in view of the added cost of living and the rise in wages elsewhere, they will be attracted from Washington.

Let me say, Mr. President, I would not regard the diminution of employees in the Public Printing Office as an unmixed evil. I think it is safe to say that 50 per cent of the printing done by the Government of the United States consists of time, printers' ink, and paper wasted. I think it is safe to say that less than 50 per cent of the material turned out by the Government Printing Office, which is the greatest in the world, is ever read by anybody, and it is certain that 95 per cent of it is forgotten before it is three months old.

The Senator from Utah remembers that some months ago he and I unsuccessfully resisted an application to print a report on the electric power in the United States, the object being to show that it was a monopoly. We said everybody knew it was a monopoly, that it did not require a printer's bill costing the Government $91,000 to establish that proposition. We also said that nobody would read it after it was published, and that everybody would forget it within three months thereafter. I venture the assertion that not a single Member of the Senate has ever read that ponderous document. I venture the assertion that not 10 per cent of those who now listen to me remember a thing about it or even the incident of its publication. So far as the public getting benefit from that money is concerned, we might just as well have taken it out to the incinerating furnace and destroyed it.

Let the bill pass. I shall not oppose it, as I said; but it will not affect anything except to minister to the tendency to increase prices and to diminish to that extent the money in the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator from Colorado that the Joint Committee on Printing are now undertaking, with every power at their command under the law that was passed as an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, to cut out needless publications, and the statement made by the Senator from Colorado is absolutely correct. There is at least one-half of the printing of the departments of the Government that never ought to be allowed. We are trying to cut it down, but, notwithstanding we have already cut it down at least $100,000, we are short in the number of men required, and if we are going to do the printing that is required we must increase the pay. That is why I plead for this legislation at this time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what under the bill a printer will receive for ordinary work?

Mr. SMOOT. Each printer under the bill, counting in the $240 bonus which began on the 1st day of July, will receive 85 cents per hour, and if they work eight hours a day it will be $6.80 a day.

Mr. McCUMBER. What does a policeman receive?

Mr. SMOOT. Do you mean in the District?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; policemen in the District and policemen around the Capitol.

Mr. SMOOT. The policemen around the Capitol receive $1,050 and $240 bonus; that is $1,290 a year.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is how much a day?

Mr. SMOOT. It is about $4.30 a day, counting 300 working days in a year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Can the Senator give me a very good reason for paying a policeman, considering the intelligence there ought to be in the matter of police service, $4.30 a day and paying our printers $6.80?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not saying anything as to whether the policemen around the Capitol are receiving sufficient pay or not, but I do know that there is quite a difference between the service rendered by the police around the Capitol and the service rendered by a competent linotype operator or a first-class printer or proof reader, and that is the type of work we are trying to take care of and retain at this time.

I will admit to the Senator frankly that $1,050 for policemen around the Capitol, under conditions existing to-day, is not sufficient. But I know we can get 10 policemen around the Capitol where we can not get one of this class of labor in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it shows, Mr. President, the bad system of selecting one class and raising wages without having a general bill to cover all classes of Government employees. There is no question that there are great inconsistencies and injustices under the present system which we have adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt that is true. Every printer, every linotype operator, who is in the Government Printing Office can leave there to-day and get at least $1 an hour, and many of them are paid $1.25 an hour in different shops throughout the United States. I will admit that if it were possible to regulate these things in a comprehensive, businesslike way that should be done, but we are up against a situation to-day that we must act upon or we can not do the work. I do not stand upon the floor of the Senate and talk this way unless I know what the true situation is.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I feel confident that the Senator reporting the bill has given us the true situation, and therefore I do not feel disposed to offer an objection to this bill, but shall support the same.

While we are discussing the subject of adjusting salaries and doing justice by those who are serving and those who have served their country I wish as one Senator to add my hearty indorsement to the sentiment of the 6,000,000 loyal and patriotic American citizens who have petitioned the United States Senate and the House of Representatives to do justice by the soldiers who went to the battle front and won the victory for our beloved country. I think, Mr. President, we have been a little tardy in doing justice by the men who responded to the call of their country, who endured the heat of summer, the chill of winter, and bore the brunt of battle and carried the great sacrifices which brought victory to our Republic in the greatest of all wars.

Feeling that, as a grateful Nation, as an appreciative people, we should give a token to our soldiers who had so loyally served their country for a pittance of $30 per month, the next day after the armistice was signed I introduced a bill providing that each soldier should be given a bonus of one month's salary. I did not restrict it to this sum because I thought that was all he merited. I restricted it to that amount, however, because at that time the War Department, so the papers stated, was willing to give approval to a measure paying them only such sum. The step was taken as an entering wedge. I tried to get the amount increased to three months. As an outcome of that the conferees adopted the $60-bonus amendment.

Our soldiers who have been discharged and those who will be discharged have received $60; but, Mr. President, I do not think that amount is sufficient reward, is sufficient recognition and token of the Nation's gratitude to these men who made the sacrifice and endured the hardship of the battle. I am heartily in sympathy with the sentiments expressed by these 6,000,000 people. From my observation and from the expressions that I have heard from the people throughout the country, I do not believe that it is the desire of the American people that the American Congress shall deal with the soldiers in a penurious way; that we shall withhold from them a just recognition of the Nation's gratitude. I do not know of anyone who objects to paying the bonus. So I arose, Mr. President, for the purpose of suggesting that the United States Senate and the House of Representatives should consider seriously the matter of enacting appropriate legislation to give a reasonable bonus to our soldiers who endured great hardships and won the victory for their Nation in the battles of the recent war.

Of course $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 looks like a tremendous sum, but when it comes to a question of making adjustments of other claims I have noticed running all through the governmental departments and all through the action of the Senate a disposition to repair any losses or any injuries that individual citizens or companies or corporations may have suffered, though they did not shoulder a gun and go to the battle front.

Who is there who can say that the soldier serving for $30 a month did not make a sacrifice for his country that a grateful nation should reward when it is amply able to do so? I had a letter a few days ago from a friend of mine in Florida, who stated to me that he did not know what his son would have done in order to purchase a suit of civilian clothes and a few other articles of wearing apparel if it had not been for the $60 bonus. By the time he paid his insurance and made certain contributions in the way of allotments to his parents he had the pitiable sum of five or six dollars left out of his salary. Many soldiers are left penniless when they quit the service, and I contend, Mr. President, that $60 is not sufficient.

I believe the more equitable and just plan would be to place it upon the basis of a graduated scale—that is, those who have served from 90 to 120 days, allowing credit for the present bonus of $60, should receive, say, $90; those who have served from four to five months should receive $120; those who have served from five to six months should receive $150; and all who have served seven months or more, $150. I believe, according to the scale which I have suggested in my amendment, those who have served from six to seven months should receive $150. That would make the lower class, who had served less than three months, receive $90, the next class $120, the next class $150, the highest class being $150; with the $60 already received, making a total of $210.

I am not sure just what that would amount to, though I have asked both the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, to give me a report as to the number that would be in each class. I believe, however, that would be the more equitable plan.

I feel that we will be just a little tardy, just a little neglectful, if we delay much longer giving a substantial recognition to our soldiers. For that reason, Mr. President, I hope that the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate will deem it proper soon to give serious consideration to this subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not much believe in mixing up patriotism and money. I remember that after the Confederate soldiers came back home they not only did not have any bonuses but they did not have anything else except now and then a horse that Grant let them bring home to put in their crops.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi permit a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Is it not a fact that all of the Confederate States have for years pensioned their soldiers in recognition of the service which they rendered for their country and that those States are doing so to-day?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. Mr. President, the Southern States have pensioned such of their soldiers as have needed help.

I never have had much sympathy with mixing up money and patriotism; I never have had much sympathy with what is called the "roll of honor," giving a man money, whether he needed it or not, just because he had served his country in time of war. I do believe that every community, no matter how poor, ought to take care of those who in the service of their country have become crippled or otherwise disabled; but I can not find it in my heart to approve of any system that calls upon the citizens of a country to come pretty near bankrupting themselves because you or I or somebody else had been called into the service and did his duty in the service. I do not believe my boys want it; I do not believe the other boys want it; I do not believe any of them want to profiteer at the expense of their country. I do not believe that they want to capitalize their patriotism. We passed an act of insurance and indemnity and reparation, and Heaven knows what else, with the hope that it would take the place of pensions and bonuses.

I can not speak for all the soldiers coming back, but I do hope that our boys, having made a magnificent record in Europe for courage, fortitude, good nature, and enthusiasm, charging, as somebody has said, as if there was a bet as to which should reach the German trenches first, are not coming back with the idea of bankrupting the United States Treasury. Of course, if they wish to do that, they can do it; they have the votes; they can effect the necessary organization; they can influence politicians; they can make every Member of the Senate and of the House come up to the lick log, and, if they want to, they can literally bankrupt the Government; but I do not believe they want to do it; I know mine do not.

Mr. President, I have a reminiscence in my mind. I remember when old Maj. Pickett came to my grandmother and said, "Mrs. Sharp, you are entitled to a service pension because Capt. Sharp was an officer in the Mexican War." He was wounded at Buena Vista, but not seriously in the long run. My old grandmother, Scoteh-Irish as she was, turned around and said, "Major, I will have you know that Capt. Sharp did not fight for money." I want the boys who wore the uniform of this country and who upheld its honor to be able to say that they did not fight for money.

Why, Mr. President, if we were going to pay a soldier what his service was worth, risking his life, risking his property, and risking the dependence of his family, it would be cheap at $40,000 a year apiece, and if he demanded what it was worth he would bankrupt this country. You not only could not help yourselves, you not only could not pay the war debt, but you could not help the other nations of the world that need help. I do not believe that they want to enter into that sort of a conspiracy, although I have received letters from several of them that indicate the very utmost degree of selfishness and the utmost disposition to subject this Government to all sorts of demands that they can obtain from it in the way of money, but I believe they are a mere minority.

Mr. President, I rose, however, for the purpose of presenting an amendment to the pending bill. If we have reached the proper place for its consideration, I want it considered, but if not I want it pending. I move to strike out the period in line 8, after the word "employed," insert a comma, and add the words "the compensation for the foreman of printing, the foreman of binding, and the foreman of press work is increased from $2,500 to $3,000."

A friend of mine brought this amendment to me and told me that it ought to be adopted. I promised to offer it and I promised to make the best argument in favor of it that I could. Meanwhile I have had a talk with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who tells me that for certain reasons it ought not to be adopted. Notwithstanding his argument I think it ought to be adopted, because I believe that if the other members of the force are to have their salaries increased these men ought to have theirs increased proportionately. I shall leave it for the consideration of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to say a word. I sincerely hope the Senate will not approve this amendment. The object of asking for the consideration of the bill at this time is so that it may be returned to the House of Representatives to-morrow and be signed before that body adjourns.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I have just heard from the House that they are not going to adjourn

Mr. SMOOT. I heard a few moments ago that there was such a suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. They have received a message from the President of the United States asking them to remain in session.

Mr. SMOOT. So I have heard.

Mr. President, the three men who are involved in the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi are receiving to-day $2,500 a year, and they will also receive the $240 bonus, making $2,740. What the committee had in view was to take care of the men who are to-day only receiving 65 cents an hour, and we are in hopes that nothing more will be added to this bill. Therefore, Mr. President, I trust the Senate will not adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to treat the public employees fairly relatively to one another, and if you are going to increase the salaries of these other people the salaries of the foremen ought to be increased also. I do not wish to express an opinion as to how much they should be increased, although I have offered an amendment stating how much; but I do think it is very unfair to increase one and not increase another, although you carry one under the description of a bonus and the other under the description of a salary.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is mistaken about that. They all get the bonus of $240. The only reason why I referred to that was because the Senator's amendment proposes to increase them from $2,500 to $3,000, whereas they get to-day $2,500 and a bonus since the 1st of July of $240, making $2,750.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do they all get $2,500? Some of them get only $2,300, as I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will say to the Senator that the foremen get $2,500.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I will leave it to the good sense of the Senate. I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask what the amendment is?

Mr. SMOOT. It is to increase the salary of the foremen of printing and binding from $2,500 to $3,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is offered as an amendment to the House bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is offered as an amendment to the House bill by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably, with amendments, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) to authorize the President to convene the first meeting of the international labor conference in Washington and to appoint delegates thereto, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I ask to have the joint resolution read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out the preamble, and the joint resolution reads:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to convene and to make arrangements for the organization of such first meeting of the said conference and to appoint delegates thereto: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall be held to authorize the President to appoint any delegates to represent the United States of America at the said meeting of such conference or to authorize the United States of America to participate therein unless and until the Senate shall have ratified the provisions of the said proposed treaty of peace with reference to such general international labor conference.

Mr. LODGE. There are some amendments proposed by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendments were, on page 2, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "such first meeting of the said conference and to appoint delegates thereto" and insert "a general international labor conference to be held in Washington, D. C."; in line 6 strike out the words "the said meeting of"; in line 9, after the words "treaty of peace," insert the words "with Germany"; in line 9 strike out the word "such" and insert the article "a."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts just exactly what the effect of this will be? It is impossible for a Senator hearing the joint resolution read in this way to know what it proposes.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the joint resolution be read as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to convene and to make arrangements for the organization of a general international labor conference to be held in Washington, D. C.: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall be held to authorize the President to appoint any delegates to represent the United States of America at such conference or to authorize the United States of America to participate therein unless and until the Senate shall have ratified the provisions of the proposed treaty of peace with Germany with reference to a general international labor conference.

Mr. THOMAS. I assume that the purpose of this joint resolution is to provide for a meeting of an international labor conference such as is provided for in part 13 of the treaty. Is that correct?

Mr. LODGE. That is the labor conference that is covered by it, undoubtedly.

Mr. THOMAS. The treaty, among other things, requires the league of nations to pay the expenses of these conferences. Do I understand that this meeting, if held, and if the treaty in the meantime should be ratified, would be subject to that requirement?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I understand the treaty, certain expenses are paid by the powers appointing delegates. Other expenses are paid from the general fund of the league. There is no provision in the treaty that I have been able to find for that general fund.

Mr. THOMAS. I know there is not.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know where it is coming from, and I do not know anything about it; but it is mentioned in that article; so I suppose there will be a general fund.

Mr. THOMAS. The contingency I have in mind is that if such a fund is not provided by that time, Congress will be requested to make an appropriation for the payment of these expenses.

Mr. LODGE. I think it highly probable.

Mr. THOMAS. The provision to which I refer is article 424:

The first meeting of the conference shall take place in October, 1919. The place and agenda for this meeting shall be as specified in the annex hereto.

Arrangements for the convening and the organization of the first meeting of the conference will be made by the Government designated for the purpose in the said annex.

That is the United States.

That Government shall be assisted in the preparation of the documents for submission to the conference by an international committee constituted as provided in the said annex.

The expenses of the first meeting and of all subsequent meetings held before the league of nations has been able to establish a general fund, other than the expenses of delegates and their advisers, will be borne by the members in accordance with the apportionment of the expenses of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union.

Of course I am unable to say when the Senate will finally vote upon the treaty. It may be that the treaty will be disposed of in some fashion before this meeting is held in October, and it may not; but I think the Congress should bear in mind the possible contingency of a request made to it to meet these expenses, or some of them, out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this joint resolution, introduced by the Senator from Iowa, came before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and we heard the Secretary of Labor in regard to it this morning. It is desired simply that the President should be relieved from the inhibition placed upon him by a clause in the general deficiency act approved March 4, 1913. That clause prohibits the President from calling conventions of any kind. This was to give him the opportunity to call this convention, but there is no authority given—in fact, the authority is expressly withheld—to appoint delegates or to have the United States participate. This merely gives authority to the President to issue invitations to the labor delegates of other nations. The committee amended the joint resolution and presented it to the Senate and asked for immediate action, because it seems important—it seemed more important this morning—that there should be immediate action this afternoon.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. As the joint resolution now reads, the expenses of the different delegates of these various countries will be borne by the nations themselves.

Mr. LODGE. That is in the treaty.

Mr. KENYON. No; but as the matter now stands, if we pass this joint resolution, there is nothing in it about the expense.

Mr. LODGE. No; there is nothing in it about expense.

Mr. KENYON. Each nation would have to bear the expenses of its own delegates.

Mr. LODGE. That is provided in the treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But even if there were no treaty and if we made no appropriation they would have to do it anyhow.

Mr. LODGE. We shall have to make an appropriation probably to care for them when they are here. I fancy nothing very large.

Mr. KENYON. That is a question that may arise later.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And there will be no American delegates unless, in the meantime, the treaty shall have been ratified.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if it would not be wise to put in this joint resolution the usual provision in the case of joint resolutions of this kind, that no future appropriation shall be made for the expenses of the delegates or the conference?

Mr. LODGE. Why, Mr. President, that is all provided for in the treaty. If the meeting is ever held, it is provided for in the treaty. The joint resolution did not go beyond that point, and the committee thought it wise not to go any further.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator has said so before, I did not happen to hear it; but will the Senator now say upon what date it is planned that this conference shall be held?

Mr. LODGE. In the treaty it is fixed for October, 1919. The joint resolution fixes no date. It leaves it to the President to convene it when he chooses.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the best answer to the inquiry is that the treaty fixes the date?

Mr. LODGE. The treaty fixes a date.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A date. Then this really means the meeting to be held under the treaty, or is it quite uncertain as to when it is to be?

Mr. LODGE. No; it leaves it to the President to select any date that he may desire. The date was left out purposely.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was wondering what is the cause for haste in consideration.

Mr. LODGE. The cause for haste is that the House wants to adjourn for five weeks to-morrow. There seems to be a cloud of uncertainty over that adjournment, but that was the basis of the haste and demand for immediate action; and the Senate committee complied with the wishes of the Secretary by bringing it in at once this afternoon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator from Massachusetts quite confident that the passage of this joint resolution by the Senate will have no bearing whatsoever upon the Senate's consideration of the peace treaty and the covenant of the league of nations?

Mr. LODGE. I can not see how it has any. The peace treaty is alluded to where we prohibit the appointment of delegates, which was in the original joint resolution. I do not think the allusion there made will have any effect on ratifying the treaty

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New York is glad to be assured of that.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to say why I was willing to vote for this joint resolution. The Secretary of Labor, representing, of course, the administration, appeared before the Committee on Foreign Relations this morning and asked to have this, or practically this, joint resolution passed.

I understood from his statement—and if I am not correct about that the Secretary is present and somebody can answer for him—that if this joint resolution were passed it would have no relation whatever to the treaty. The resolution as presented by the Secretary of Labor contains a distinct provision that the United States is not to be represented at this conference unless and until the proposed treaty of peace with Germany is ratified. Speaking for myself, I do not propose to be put in the position that I am estopped in any way, by voting for the joint resolution, from opposing the treaty in any or all its provisions as I see fit, and if it is not so generally understood by the Senate I shall oppose the consideration of it and vote against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How could it be otherwise understood?

Mr. KNOX. I do not think it is otherwise understood.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I introduced the joint resolution at the request of the Secretary of Labor, because a very embarrassing situation had arisen—embarrassing to the administration and to him. The position stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania is exactly the position of the Secretary of Labor.

If the treaty shall be ratified in the meantime, then possibly other questions will arise. But this measure has in its present form nothing at all to do with the treaty; nobody is estopped by any action he may take here, and that is thoroughly understood.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, Mr. President, if there had been any thought that this measure had anything to do with the ratification of the treaty or affected it in any way it certainly would not have been reported, as it has been, with the unanimous favorable vote of the committee. It has, in my judgment, no effect whatever upon the treaty, its ratification, or its amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may add a word, it was especially called to the attention of the committee by the Secretary of Labor this morning that the treaty itself provided that it should take effect, as between the parties ratifying it, so soon as it was ratified by three of the nations. The treaty itself provides that the President shall call this first international convention, so it follows that as soon as the treaty is ratified by three or more of the signatory powers there is a request in the treaty itself to the President to call this convention together.

It is simply a courtesy, as it seems to me, to the other nations that may ratify the treaty, and every one understands, of course, that it will have no influence whatever upon the individual judgment of any Senator who may be called upon to act in regard to the treaty later on.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee recommends the striking out of the preamble, and it will be stricken out without objection.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to authorize the President to convene a meeting of an international labor conference in Washington, D. C."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 30 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

REPEAL OF DAYLIGHT-SAVING LAW.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3854) for the repeal of the daylight-saving law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Harris	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Johnson, Calif.	Nugent	Spencer
Capper	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Swanson
Cummins	Kirby	Phipps	Thomas
Dial	Knox	Pittman	Underwood
Elkins	La Follette	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Fall	McKellar	Sheppard	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	McNary	Sherman	Warren
Gay	Moses	Smith, Ariz.	Watson
Gerry	Myers	Smith, Ga.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. KING, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. TRAMMELL answered to their names when called.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. NEW entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I intend to keep my promise in regard to this bill. All that I desire to say is that a vote in the affirmative means the repeal of the daylight-saving part of the act of 1918. A vote in the negative means the retention of the so-called daylight-saving law. I believe that every Senator knows precisely how he wants to vote upon the question, and I have no intention of further taking up the time of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is done about the matter of standard time?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not disturbed.

Mr. WARREN. I remember that that was the occasion of the veto.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it was not.

Mr. WARREN. I mean, as it appeared in the papers.

Mr. CUMMINS. The veto was lodged against the proposal in the bill to advance the clock one hour at a certain time of the year and to retard it one hour at another time of the year. That is the provision as contained in section 3 of the act to which I have referred. The other two sections of the bill remain as they were originally.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if this bill attempts to accomplish the same purpose as the amendment that was in the bill that was vetoed by reason of the amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think this is identical with that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then, Mr. President, I make the point of order against the bill on the ground that it is identical legislation with legislation that at this session of Congress was defeated by a veto of the President, and a failure of the Congress to pass it over the veto by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I correct myself? The bill, of course, accomplishes the same general result with regard to the daylight-saving portion of the law as it now is; but it is not identical with the amendment that was attached to the Agricultural appropriation bill in that the first two sections of the act of 1918 are retained in the present bill, and no mention was made of them in the amendment that was attached to the appropriation act. So there is no identity of bills or measures. There is a certain identity in the objects to be accomplished.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I take it that the substance of the legislation is the same, and that merely stating it in different language would be an evasion of the rule of the Senate. If it were not so, this body could be compelled to vote time and time again upon, in substance, exactly the same legislation after it had been defeated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not in possession of the language of the original bill, so as to make a comparison. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that when a measure has once been defeated in this body it can not be again introduced and voted upon at the same session of the Senate; but this was not defeated, even if it was in the same terms. This was passed by the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I assumed that all Senators were familiar with the general course of this legislation.

This is a House bill. It has come to the Senate in the regular way. It has been reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce by a large majority of that committee. The act of 1918 provides, in its first section:

> That for the purpose of establishing the standard time of the United States the territory of continental United States shall be divided into five zones in the manner hereinafter provided. The standard time of the first zone shall be based on the mean astronomical time of the seventy-fifth degree of longitude west from Greenwich; that of the second zone on the ninetieth degree; that of the third zone on the one hundred and fifth degree; that of the fourth zone on the one hundred and twentieth degree; and that of the fifth zone, which shall include only Alaska, on the one hundred and fiftieth degree. That the limits of each zone shall be defined by an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, having regard for the convenience of commerce and the existing junction points and division points of common carriers engaged in commerce between the several States and with foreign nations, and such order may be modified from time to time.

The section I have just read remains unaffected by the bill now before the Senate.

Section 2 provides:

> That within the respective zones created under the authority hereof the standard time of the zone shall govern the movement of all common carriers engaged in commerce between the several States or between a State and any of the Territories of the United States, or between a State or the Territory of Alaska and any of the insular possessions of the United States or any foreign country. In all statutes, orders, rules, and regulations relating to the time of performance of any act by any officer or department of the United States, whether in the legislative, executive, or judicial branches of the Government, or relating to the time within which any rights shall accrue or determine, or within which any act shall or shall not be performed by any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, it shall be understood and intended that the time shall be the United States standard time of the zone within which the act is to be performed.

That section of the act of 1918 remains unimpaired, untouched, by the bill that is now before the Senate.

Section 3 of the act to which I am referring, the act of 1918, reads as follows:

> That at 2 o'clock a. m. of the last Sunday in March of each year the standard time of each zone shall be advanced one hour, and at 2 o'clock a. m. of the last Sunday in October in each year the standard time of each zone shall, by the retarding of one hour, be returned to the mean astronomical time of the degree of longitude governing said zone, so that between the last Sunday in March at 2 o'clock a. m. and the last Sunday in October at 2 o'clock a. m. in each year the standard time in each zone shall be one hour in advance of the mean astronomical time of the degree of longitude governing each zone, respectively.

The bill before the Senate repeals that section of the act of 1918. The amendment attached to the Agricultural appropriation bill repeals the entire act of March, 1918; so it can not be said that there is any complete identity between the amendment put upon the appropriation bill and the bill now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is the repealing clause of the Agricultural appropriation bill:

That at and after 2 o'clock a. m. on Sunday, October 26, 1919, next, the act entitled "An act to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States," approved March 19, 1918, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

That was a repeal of the entire statute, while this is only a repeal of one section. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not care to take up any time in discussing the bill. I will simply mention the fact that the effect of the law as it stands is to cause the people in Florida to advance their clocks and watches two hours, and it is rather inconvenient; so the present condition is that at 7 o'clock in the morning it is scarcely daylight and at 8 o'clock in the evening it is full daylight.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a communication signed "Nina H. Weaver, lecturer, Grange No. 957, Clintondale, N. Y., July 16, 1919," which a constituent sends to me with his approval and which seems to me to furnish all the argument that need be offered.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHILDREN AS WELL AS COWS.

To the Editor of The Tribune.

SIR: In your editorial of yesterday, "Daylight saving to continue," you speak as though the only possible objection to the thoroughly childish setting of the clock one hour ahead was that the dairymen have to catch earlier trains. I have no doubt that you will class the objections I cite here as "avoidable inconveniences," and in that I will agree; but the only method of avoidance is repeal.

Our children have to go 4 miles to school, and where rising at 7 o'clock used to be early enough now it is 6, and they can't get the needed sleep in the evening, for it is daylight. I haven't heard one mother of small children speak in favor of daylight saving.

Not only is it difficult for farmers to harvest their hay and grain with the dew heavy on their crops in the morning and the help quitting work at 4 o'clock (sun time), just as the grain is in the best condition, but the fruit growers also have to leave their currants and berries, their grapes and pears, their peaches and apples, until the morning is half gone, and then when the picking is good the pickers are gone.

But you will say this matter could be arranged between the farmer and his employees, so that they will stay later. Why could not the matter be arranged between the city employer and employees so that they go to work an hour earlier? Then they will have their coveted hour extra for recreation without upsetting the whole country and causing such great discomfort, inconvenience, and pecuniary loss to a good half the population.

The newspapers, politicians, and the President himself, with the other devotees of the labor unions, make the mistake of thinking the farmers are in a little world of their own, which they need not so much as notice, not to mention giving their rights any consideration. But your newspaper advertises "First to last—the truth," but on the questions which concern agriculture you have very distorted views, and I would advise that you search out the truth. It is not enough for any paper to portray the public sentiment just around it; it should seek to portray the best public sentiment and lead up to the best American ideals, which include some regard for the rights of others.

NINA H. WEAVER,
Lecturer, Grange No. 957.

CLINTONDALE, N. Y., July 16, 1919.

P. S.—As an item of information I might add that the grange, the Dairymen's League, the farm bureau, the horticultural socities and all farmers' organizations are opposed to the daylight-saving law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the House will probably rescind the concurrent resolution to-night, and certainly to-morrow, I think. In any event, it will be necessary for the Senate to be in session, because the concurrent resolution can not be rescinded without our joining them in the act. Therefore, unless the Senator from Iowa desires to go on at this hour——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I shall occupy the time of the Senate for only a moment or two.

This matter has been voted upon by the House four separate and distinct times during the present session: First, when the bill we are considering passed the House; second, when the Senate amendment to the agricultural bill, referred to a moment ago, was agreed to by the House; third, when the effort was made, which failed, to override the President's veto; fourth, when an amendment was offered to the agricultural bill containing the same language as the bill now under consideration. At that time it was defeated by a very large majority. We are now really attempting to pass a bill which will cover the same ground as the amendment in the agricultural appropriation bill which the President vetoed and upon which the Senate has already acted.

I do not think it is necessary for me to go into the details of this measure. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] this morning had read into the RECORD a letter from the antituberculosis league of the United States, in which it was contended that this law was helpful to the health of the country. Every one of us, I am sure, has received letters, telegrams, and petitions on this subject from all over the country. My own judgment is that at least 80 per cent of the people of the United States desire this law to continue.

No measure that has been passed in recent years has been more appreciated by the teeming millions of our citizens who are employed in the factories, workshops, and offices of the country.

It has afforded these people an additional hour of recreation at the close of the day. It has given men who labor, an opportunity of enjoying an additional hour with their families while there is still daylight, tending to their gardens, and working around their homes. It has exchanged, for a vast majority of our people, an hour of daylight for an hour of darkness.

Undoubtedly the President will veto this bill again, and the Senate will have wasted its time in the discussion of it. I received a letter this morning from a citizen of my State who said that he thought the Senate, rather than engaging in passing legislation attempting to repeal this law, or discussing the league of nations or prohibition legislation, might better be engaged in doing something to reduce the high cost of living. I say so, too.

This measure, in its operation last year, undoubtedly saved at least 1,500,000 tons of coal which otherwise would have been used, and reduced the bills for artificial illumination at least 10 per cent in the seven months of its operation, and I think it fairly can be said by those who have studied the question that the vast majority of our people wish to have it continued.

I hope, Mr. President, that the bill will be voted down.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I had not intended to say a word on this bill because I did not deem it necessary, but after listening to the statement of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] that it would be a saving of untold millions to the people of this country to continue to keep on our statute books this so-called daylight-saving law, I believe that I should say a word. I think that it can be demonstrated that the law has been a detriment to the producers of this country, and I do not believe that the claims made by the friends of this bill to the effect that it has saved our country many millions of dollars can be substantiated by facts.

Mr. President, let us look at this question for just a moment. Labor is scarce and difficult to obtain on the farm at the present time. Those who are familiar with farm work know that when 6 o'clock comes the farm laborer is ready and will quit his work. Every one of us ought to know that, during the summer time at least, when the farmer goes to work in the morning his work must be postponed for an hour or two because of the heavy dew which he finds in the field. With this law in effect he loses an additional hour. It has been estimated, I do not know with what accuracy, that by reason of the present law there has been an actual loss to the farmers of the United States of from ten to fifteen million dollars a day.

If this be true, may I ask the Senator from New York, or some other Senator, how it can be argued that this law has been the means of saving the people of this country any money whatsoever? It has been stated that this law has saved the people of this country a million five hundred thousand tons of coal by reducing the use of artificial light. This can not possibly be true, because the present law provides that at 2 o'clock antemeridian on the last Sunday of March the standard time of each zone shall be advanced one hour, and that on the last Sunday in October the clock is moved back one hour, so that this law operates between the last Sunday in March and the last Sunday in October. How can it be argued that there is a saving in fuel and light by advancing the clock one hour during the summer months? I think it must be conceded by everyone that during the summer and fall months it is daylight at 6 o'clock in the evening sun time, but let me remind you that at 6 o'clock new time in the morning, which would be 5 o'clock sun time, it is not daylight, and the farmer who has chores to do will have to use a lantern in the barn for an extra hour for at least two months during this period of time, and the housewife is compelled to burn electricity, kerosene oil, the tallow candle, or whatever she may have to burn at least one hour longer. This statement can not be contradicted, so where is your saving in coal or oil?

Mr. President, I simply want to say that every farm organization in this country is opposed to the legislation which was enacted on this subject. I want to state further that several labor organizations in the cities have sent memorials to me as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry protesting against the law and asking for its repeal. I can not state with accuracy that a majority of the laboring men are against the law, but I believe that a large majority of those who really perform labor are against it, and, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the American Federation of Labor voted by an overwhelming majority in favor of the repeal of the law.

Mr. President, the hour is late and I can not possibly take up the time of the Senate to intelligently discuss this subject. I simply want to say that this is a law in the interest of no one; that it is only for the convenience of a few who wish to play golf or some other game of recreation and amusement, to which, of course, I have no objection; but I repeat that the farmer is the only one who actually sustains a financial loss, and I challenge contradiction of that statement by anyone.

Mr. President, I have a great many letters and memorials from people throughout the country asking for the repeal of this law. I ask unanimous consent to have a few of these letters and resolutions printed in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

Article from Stockman and Farmer:

DAYLIGHT SAVING.

Agriculture, the greatest industry in America, was responsible for the repeal of daylight saving, which it has found after fair trial to be a costly nuisance. Agriculture is consequently disappointed by the President's veto. No one who is familiar with the operation and effect of daylight saving outside of cities can possibly agree with the President's statement that it "gave all but universal satisfaction." Outside of the city, and in some cities also, it gave all but universal dissatisfaction, or farmers would never have insisted on its repeal. Dairy farmers, who normally work all hours of daylight, can't see why they should work in the dark for the sake of industrial classes, who work only eight hours at any time. Other farmers are too dense to understand why they should pay men to work when it is impossible to do anything so that other men can quit in the middle of the afternoon. The end of this matter is not yet in sight. The present plan is intolerable to agriculture and the law must either be repealed or some adjustment made whereby farmers are relieved of its resulting waste of time and labor, already inadequate to save the crops. The President's veto will probably stand, and unless farmers can show him some things he apparently doesn't know they have a slim chance of getting rid of daylight saving.

Letters from "A Farmer and Dairyman," urging repeal of daylight-saving law:

WEST NEWTON, PA., July 21, 1919.

Senator GRONNA, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We see by the daily paper that you are taking a noble stand in the interest of agriculture and justice to the American farmer and dairyman, and you can surely count on the farmer and dairyman as your friends, and we hope you will continue the fight until you win.

We have written a letter to the President, which we send to you for inspection. If you think it would do our cause any good, would like for you to take a copy and have it published, particularly an article which we have inclosed from the Stockman and Farmer, the greatest farm paper in the United States. If you think it would be any offense to the President to publish a letter that was addressed to him, we would not want it published or for him to know that you had inspected it, without you could arrange in such a way that he would not know how you received a copy. Please inclose the article and letter as soon as possible.

With best of wishes, I remain,

Your friend,

A FARMER AND DAIRYMAN.

WEST NEWTON, PA., July 21, 1919.

Mr. WOODROW WILSON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR PRESIDENT: We notice by the Pittsburgh paper that Congress is going to attempt to attach a rider to the new Agricultural bill and that you were likely to veto it again. We thought if you knew the hardships it caused the farmer and dairyman you would not do so.

While you were absent from this country during the last session, the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh took a very active part in trying to prevent the law from being repealed. We have never understood why they are so active, as they have no interest in it, particularly no vital interest, as they are business men and men of wealth, and that they sleep until 9 or 10 o'clock, and some, perhaps, later, and many of them spend the balance of the day motoring. I spent 20 years of my life in town, and I know whereof I speak. The dairyman and farmer are the ones that have a vital interest, and their wishes certainly should have the preference.

We farm and dairy, and we get up a little after 4 o'clock, making it just a little after 3 by the correct time, and other dairymen who have more cows and five or six miles to go to the train have to get up about half past 3, making it half past 2 by sun time. A farmer who has men to help him through harvest loses an hour a day on each man he has employed in the harvest field. The men come at 7 o'clock and quit at 4, and most of the mornings there is such a heavy dew that it is almost noontime before you can commence work in the harvest field, and you have to find the men something else to do until that time. If it was not for the new time, we could get an hour's more work during the day in the harvest field. The law was passed as a war measure. The farmer and dairyman stood it without any complaint. No one cares to go to bed before dark, which is about 10 o'clock, new time, and getting up at 3 or 4 o'clock, which gives them only five or six hours sleep, which, of course, you know is not enough. We see in an article from Washington that Congressmen who are against the repeal are enjoying the sport of the fight, and the farmer and dairyman have to stand the blunt. According to the papers, when you wrote the veto you made the statement that the law had given almost universal satisfaction, which was not justified by facts. As Congress represents all parts of the country, if you would consider their vote, which was 223 to 122 in favor of the repeal, and the Senate 50 to 6, ought to be evidence that people are universally dissatisfied. There was quite a number of towns that refused to turn the clock forward. Because of a few business men who have no vital interest at all, and who think their opinion represents every person's opinion, has led you to believe that the law has given satisfaction. The paper states that some of the Congressmen who are in favor of the law, and some of the business men, want to see more sunshine.

If they would get up in the morning and go to work at 7 o'clock like other people they would see more sunshine, or come to the country and help the farmers to dairy they would get all the sunshine that is coming to them. There is not any evidence of any particular benefit being derived from getting to work an hour earlier by people of the cities, but even if there had been the same thing could be accomplished without changing the clock. You have been a strong advocate of justice and humanity and the farmers are not asking anything but that which is just and right, the correct time—sun time. Now, for the sake of humanity for the farmer and dairyman, whose family has to get out at 3 o'clock in the morning, we hope that you will recommend to Congress the repeal of this obnoxious law.

Many of the soldiers who were formerly on the farm are not going back to the farm, and there are many boys leaving the farm every year and going to town, where they can go to work at 7 and quit at 4 or 5. They do not care for the farm and dairy, where they have to get up at 3 o'clock and work until dark. If the exodus of the young men continues to increase from the farms the food problem may become serious in the future, and any legislation by Congress, or any action by the President which makes farm life more unpopular to the young men on the farm, it is certainly not wise.

Some of the Congressmen claim there was a saving of fuel. The report made to Congress last fall that there was no saving at all in the Pittsburgh district and there was only a few cities in the United States that reported any saving, and no doubt that was because fuel was high and hard to obtain and for patriotic reasons.

We know that in this section that the time the law went into effect, the 1st of March, and it will be the same this fall, commencing about September, that men who go to work at 7 o'clock were going just about daylight, and by changing the time they were pushed back into the dark an hour. Now if it should take one quart of oil for each family in the morning and if people would go to bed an hour earlier in the evening and save a quart where would be the gain? If the clock had been moved back, then all men who go to work at 7 a. m. and their families could have gotten up at daylight or after, and had gone to bed an hour earlier in the evening, then there would have been some sense in the fuel-saving claim.

Now, taking all these things into consideration we believe you will come to the conclusion there is nothing in the law, not even good common sense.

In the Canadian Parliament the same kind of bill was proposed but did not pass. One of the reasons given was that it would cause an ill feeling between the city and country people, but our "sunshine" Congressmen do not take that into consideration. Please find inclosed an article from the Stockman and Farmer, the greatest farm paper in the United States, which we hope you will consider carefully.

Hoping you will consider this letter kindly, with the greatest respect and good will for our President, we remain,

Yours, truly,

A FARMER AND DAIRYMAN.

A letter from Bloomfield, Conn., requesting repeal of the law:

TUNXIS GRANGE, No. 13, P. OF H.,
Bloomfield, Conn., May 6, 1919.

To the Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We, members of Tunxis Grange, No. 13, P. of H., Bloomfield, Conn., have passed the following resolution requesting the next Congress to repeal the so-called "daylight-saving law."

We consider it detrimental, unnecessary, and actual injustice to the farmer.

Very cordially, yours,

F. M. MAUSUR, Master.
ANNIE M. CHRISTENSEN, Secretary.

Riverside Grange, 125, of Three Bridges, N. J., comprising 300 members, requests your support in the repeal of the daylight-saving bill now pending in Congress.

A memorial from the Marion County Farm Bureau urging the repeal of the law:

SALEM, ILL., July 18, 1919.

AGRICULTURAL COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Every farmer and his family on the 3,425 farms in Marion County, Ill., are looking to you to pass the repeal of the daylight-saving law over the President's veto. It works a great disadvantage on the farm and causes millions of dollars loss to the farmers in Illinois every year. There is absolutely no benefit in this daylight-saving law for the farmer. When the farmer makes up the greater part of the population of the United States, we petition you as a farm bureau and I as a county agent to do all in your power to see that this daylight-saving law is repealed.

Yours, very truly,

MARION COUNTY FARM BUREAU,
FRED J. BLACKBURN, County Agent.

Letter from National Grange, with inclosures against the law:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 14, 1919.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Senate Committee on Agriculture,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wish to express our appreciation of your efforts and those of your colleagues in reporting the daylight-saving repeal measure as an amendment to the appropriation bill. In view of the favorable report from the House Committee on Agriculture and later from Interstate Commerce, and the general turn of public sentiment as evidenced in the recent action at Atlantic City, as well as the continued flood of petitions from farm organizations, it seems as if this amendment might be kept in the appropriation bill and make an end to this situation which is obnoxious to every working farmer.

I am inclosing communications recently received on this subject. If it is of value to have them in the Senate RECORD, we trust you will have this done.

Yours, sincerely,

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
THOS. C. ATKESON, Representative.

DAYLIGHT-SAVING BILL.

The farmers have been consistent as well as persistent in their fight for the repeal of the daylight-saving bill, which has worked to such a disadvantage to them. Regarding it as a war-time measure, they meekly bore it, but when it was proposed to make it perpetual they began a big fight against it.

The bill repealing it was vetoed by President Wilson recently, and the attempt to pass it over his veto failed on Monday of last week, the vote being 247 to 135. The total necessary to pass it over the veto was 255. The vote showed a large majority in favor of the repeal, but a two-thirds vote was required.

We believe the farmers have the right of it, and it is only perpetuated in the interests of the golfers and sporting element. It is a nuisance to the farmer and seriously interferes with religious work during the summer.

The following 15 arguments against the daylight-saving law are offered by the farmers:

1. Farmers waste time instead of saving.
2. Lose one hour in the morning on account of dew.
3. Hired help want to quit at 6 o'clock.
4. Forced to carry new and old time.
5. Teams and men must work in hottest part of day.
6. Can't change habits of farm animals—come up at usual time.
7. Entertainments scheduled on new time are too early for farmer's family.
8. School children have to start one hour earlier.
9. Stores and shops in country towns close too early for farmer.
10. Small town merchant must work extra hour.
11. Farmers work by sun, not by clock.
12. Must start one hour earlier to catch trains.
13. Cows must be milked one hour earlier where milk is shipped.
14. Chickens won't go to roost until usual time.
15. Increases convenience and efficiency of city folks at farmer's expense.

We trust the farmers may keep up their protests and agitation and never let up on the subject until the change is made.

Letter from Boston, Mass., showing defects of daylight saving:

333 STATE HOUSE,
Boston, Mass., July 24, 1919.

To the Hon. Mr. GRONNA,
Chairman Senate Agricultural Committee,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: May I ask you to kindly pardon the liberty I am taking, but in a few brief remarks I should like to refer to the repeal of the "daylight-saving" law.

From a standpoint of humanity to mothers and children the following-mentioned reasons would seem to favor a repeal:

One has only to walk through the crowded quarters of the north and west ends of our city and see the hundreds of children who suffer, as they do, from living in close and hot tenements. This same condition presumably exists in all of our large cities.

It is 9 o'clock according to this law, but it is 8 o'clock according to the true sun time.

Tired children should be in their beds, that weary mothers may have a few moments to relax before they themselves must retire.

It is still daylight; quiet does not prevail, and children can not sleep. Neither is sleep prolonged for them in the morning, for again at dawn begins the noise and din caused by cars and vehicles in our city streets.

What of these children when grown to men and women. The loss of many hours of sleep, together with a lack of proper nourishment in their childhood, is a serious matter and ought to be given much consideration.

The question of a repeal, as viewed from the standpoint of our domestic animals, namely, the horse and the cow, those faithful creatures on whom we are so dependent, also needs to be considered.

Many are the extra hours which the weary horses of hucksters and junk collectors must work at this season owing to this extended evening daylight.

Let us hesitate to be longer responsible for a cruel injustice deliberately imposed upon the helpless and those who can not speak for themselves.

With a hope eternal that the Members of Congress who are opposed to this repeal may be urged to favor it and thereby bestow a blessing and a benefit upon many of God's creatures.

Again asking you to kindly pardon the liberty I have taken in writing to you,

With much appreciation,
Most respectfully, yours,

(Miss) MARY E. HANNAN.

Letter from Providence, Ky., opposed to daylight saving:

PROVIDENCE, KY., July 22, 1919.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C.

SIRS: I send this letter to you not only in my own name but in the name of many others. There are multiplied thousands who never write to a Senator or Congressman or President or a committee in Congress, yet they feel the injustice done them when President Wilson vetoed the repeal of the daylight bill, briefly so called.

Can not something be done to relieve the situation? Can not a law be made, if it is necessary to have a law, that on Monday after the last Sunday in March all manufacturing plants, corporations, or any company employing so many hundred men, in cities or elsewhere, shall begin work one hour earlier and quit one hour in afternoons until Saturday before the last Sunday in October?

Of course, give us back our standard time first. Why is not the same result reached—an hour gained by going to work an hour earlier? As the law now stands, much confusion and dissatisfaction prevail. Thousands of country people do not observe the advanced hour. Men tell me they could have nearly an hour in the cool of the morning under standard time to work their gardens, but can not come out of mines or shops, where they have been for 8 or 10 hours, and go right out in hot sun to work, but must wait till the sun is going down and its cooler. Many get a crowd together after working hours and auto to some park, and many gamble or loaf. It also puts extra work on the housekeeper or wife.

In the name of multiplied thousands, keep on until we have our standard time again.

Yours,

C. R. CROWE,
Pastor Methodist Church.

A letter from a business man, of Liverpool, N. Y.:

LIVERPOOL, N. Y., July 31, 1919.

Hon. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are pleased to note inclosed clipping from Syracuse daily paper that you are fighting against this miserable, fake daylight, and if it was put to a vote for the people to vote on we will bet $500 to $50 that it would be defeated by 250,000. Find what we cut out of a church paper, inclosed.

Trusting you will fight on to victory, we remain,

Respectfully, LEHNE-MILLER CO.

DAYLIGHT SAVING.

CALDER—FOR.	GRONNA—AGAINST.
1. Ninety per cent of the people want daylight saving.	1. Majority of the people are against daylight saving.
2. Saved 1,500,000 tons coal last year by reducing use of artificial light.	2. Means additional artificial light.
3. Conserved health of people by giving an extra hour for recreation.	3. Prevents children from going to bed early and getting sufficient sleep.
4. Reduces cost of living by affording daylight in evenings for cultivation of home gardens.	4. Loses millions of dollars to farmers, who lose an hour a day because unable to start work early in morning.
5. Enables people to get up in daylight and go to bed at dark.	5. Forces farmers to get up in dark to catch milk trains.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for only a moment, but I want the RECORD to show my reason for voting in favor of a bill repealing the law.

When it was proposed as a war measure I supported it, because I thought it might be helpful, and I did not see where it would be seriously hurtful as far as war conditions were concerned. When the war was over and the question came before the Senate for its repeal, I voted for its repeal; and I intend to vote for its repeal again. My reason for doing so is not a consideration of the particular interest that has been represented here on one side or the other; but time has been fixed for ages by the movement of the sun, and I assume that it will continue to be fixed for ages to come by the movement of the sun.

As to the question of labor of all kinds adjusting itself to time, that has grown up through centuries. It is not a question of the moment. Workmen go to their bench at a certain hour because communities through generations have adjusted themselves to going to work at that hour. A lawyer goes to his desk at a certain hour because through many generations it has become the custom of lawyers to go to their desks at that hour. It is a plain custom of the people of all branches of society. They respond because sentiment and custom and their own convenience have adjusted themselves to that particular hour. We readjusted that hour for war purposes. We changed the conditions of men, their moments of going to work; but the emergency is past, and I am one of those old-fashioned Democrats who believe that except in emergencies and where questions come clearly and distinctly for the public good of all the people, it is wise to allow the people of the country to pursue the even tenor of their way and stand by the custom that generation after generation has adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator said that from time immemorial men have measured time by the movement of the sun. Did the Senator mean that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say from the time we adjusted the clock to the sun.

Mr. THOMAS. That is better.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator can interpret it in his own way.

That is my only reason, Mr. President, for voting for the repeal of the law. I think the American people have adopted the hour of going to work by custom satisfactory to them, and now that the war is over I do not see any reason why by law we should attempt to change the custom of the people.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it was my purpose to submit some remarks on the bill. I am in favor of repealing the law. However, I will merely submit a letter written to me by one of my constituents. As it is late, I will simply ask permission to have the letter printed in the RECORD without reading it. It is on the subject under discussion.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCIENTIFIC TIME VERSUS FAD TIME.

"We have heard a great deal in the newspapers for several years about daylight saving; that by setting the hands of our clocks back one hour we would save one hour of daylight and save one hour in the cost of heat and light in our homes, which would amount to many millions of dollars to the people of the country from April 1 to October 1.

"Those who have been foremost in advocating this fad time and who prevailed upon Congress to pass a law making it the legal time of the country from April 1 to October 1 do not seem to comprehend fully the meaning of the proposition they are advocating, for one day they talk about setting the hand of the clock back an hour and the next day they talk about setting the hand of the clock an hour ahead, as if it made no difference whether the hand of the clock was set back an hour or ahead an hour, whereas it makes a difference of two hours.

"We will try to make the matter so plain that there need be no confusion in the mind of anyone. The whistle of Armour's plant is heard over a large part of the city at 5 o'clock every morning. If the hand of the clock is set back one hour, it will be set at what is now 4 o'clock, but called 5 o'clock, using fad time, requiring everyone who has been awakened by the 5 o'clock whistle and getting up by it to rise an hour earlier, with the hour hand pointing to 5 o'clock, and hearing the whistle as usual.

"If we set the hand of the clock an hour ahead of natural time, we should hear the 5 o'clock whistle at what is now 6 o'clock, and be preparing to get up, and would not require any light and very little heat during the six months' change of time, whereas by the fad time legalized by act of Congress we are obliged to use two hours' lighting on the 1st of April, which gradually decreases until the summer solstice, when not more than half an hour's lighting would be necessary, but which would gradually increase from that date to the 1st of October, when we would be using two hours' lighting again, with perhaps some heat.

"What do we want to save daylight for, when under modern conditions an eight-hour day prevails in nearly every business throughout the country, and during the shortest day of the year, when the sun at the winter solstice in December, the days are not much more than nine hours' long, and it is not necessary for any man to work by artificial light, or by any other light than the light of the sun, except when he works in a shift.

"It is to be regretted that Congress, the law-making power of the country, has allowed itself to be imposed upon by faddists and led to pass a law the syllabus of which, daylight saving, is inaccurate and misleading, whereas if scientific and expert advice had been called before the committee having the matter in charge it could have been correctly advised and given an honest title to the law.

"We all know that when the sun is on the meridian, the highest point in the heavens, it is noon, the middle of the day, and the clock strikes 12; the number of hours back to sunrise is equal to the number of hours to sunset, and that when the sun is at the nadir, the lowest point beneath us, it is midnight, and that the number of hours back to sunset is equal to the number of hours to sunrise, and this is what we call sun time, or natural time. There is sidereal time, with which we need not deal here.

"Who is it really wants fad time? It surely can not be the unskilled worker, for under present conditions he is not likely to work more than nine hours, very nearly the shortest day of the year, and it is not reasonable to suppose that he is anxious to stand the cost of from two hours to half an hour for light and heat during each day of the six months, which he would not have to pay for under the natural system.

"We are not ready to believe that it would be the skilled worker—the mechanic, the machinist, who work in the factories and shops—for they work only eight hours a day, and there is no necessity for them to get up at 4 o'clock, natural time, and use two hours of heat and light, when under the natural system they would not be required to use any heat and light, except heat for cooking.

"The general business man and banker could hardly feel interested in the early rising at 4 o'clock, natural time, for they do not get to their offices and places of business before 8, 9, or 10 o'clock, nor are their places of business open to the public before 8 or 9 o'clock.

"The miners—the coal miners of the country—are opposed to the misnamed daylight-saving law, and have taken collective action to ignore it when it goes into effect April 1, and have petitioned the railroad companies operating miners' trains to leave one hour late after April 1, which would conform to natural time.

"The farmers of the country are almost as one opposed to this misnamed and misleading daylight-saving law, and have sent a protest to Congress against extending its operation, giving many reasons why its further extension would be injurious to their interests.

"Renewing the question, who is it who really wants the fad time? After a very thorough search we are unable to find anyone who is willing to strictly abide by it who wants it; but we are able to find several classes of people who certainly would not abide by its operation, yet to whom it would be a convenience in lengthening the evening end of the day; we mean the sporting fraternities.

"Golfers and baseball players almost invariably get to their fields and grounds toward the middle of the afternoon and generally play late, as long as the light is good, and who has not repeatedly heard the expression from a golf enthusiast or baseball fan, 'Oh, if we could only have had another hour of daylight to complete the game.'

"Sporting people and amusement people and their patrons, we all know, are not early risers, and we believe that they have too keen a sense of justice to want a law which they are unwilling to abide by; a law that requires the toilers of the country to rise at an unseasonable hour during six months of the year to gratify the whims of a few faddists who would not observe the letter of the law, at a cost, too, of the millions of dollars to the toilers who are expected to observe it.

"The syllabus to the law does violence to nature, for it does not represent the facts, and daylight saving should not be placed as a syllabus over the act of Congress unless the act expresses a truth, unless those who conform to the law really save daylight, which we have shown to be an impossibility.

"There has been no general discussion of the proposition of daylight saving, of the necessity for it, and, if a necessity was found, how it could be accomplished, who it would benefit most, and whether its operation would work a hardship upon any class of our people, and what advice expert scientists who are familiar with propositions relating to the divisions of time would say about the matter.

"Admitting, for argument's sake, that the law, as it stands will benefit any considerable class, which is emphatically denied, without an injury to another considerable class, let us ask, Would it not have been more just to all to have had a full discussion as to the merits of the proposition, and ascertained the wishes of all whom the changes would affect, before having Congress take action upon a proposition which, if enacted into a law, would entail unnecessary cost of millions of dollars upon the toilers of the country?

"There has been some mystery as to who was back of this misnamed daylight-saving proposition, and who was urging Congress to enact it into law, for we have seen no accounts in the newspapers of petitions from the workers and business interests of the country being forwarded to Congress asking its enactment into law.

"We first heard about this misnamed daylight-saving scheme early in the World War in connection with German efficiency, which was dinned into our ears ad nauseum, and as Germany had adopted the daylight-saving plan and set the hands of her clocks back one hour, and was saving millions of dollars by the scheme, and as she had a monopoly on 'efficiency,' the faddists seemed to have been impressed that the world should follow in her steps in daylight saving.

"It is a singular fact that the proponents of the daylight-saving plan do not quote the indorsement of a single expert scientist, whose field of science should make him familiar with every phase of the division of time, in support of the proposition, which of itself should be sufficient to cast suspicion upon it.

"It is admitted by the proponents of the daylight-saving proposition that its purpose is to require everybody to rise an hour earlier every morning for six months, from April 1 to October 1; we therefore propose to point out wherein the enforcement of such a law does violence to the rights and needed rest of men and domestic animals.

"We appeal to all persons who have been brought up on a farm, and who have had much to do in the care and management of domestic animals, particularly horses and cattle, if it is not a fact that a horse gets his main rest and sleep just before daybreak, and that cows and oxen feed the early part of the night, where they have feed, and lie down and rest and chew their cuds the latter part of the night and up to daylight.

"When a boy my father used oxen on the farm as much as horses; there was an abundence of wild grass all around us during the spring and summer that made good grazing; after using th oxc all day plowing, we unyoked the pair and turned them out to graze during the night, putting a bell on one of them, for they usually stayed together.

"My father, who was sometimes wakeful and got up several times during the night, told us the next morning before starting out to hunt up and bring in the oxen, that he had heard the jingle of the bell on the belled one until the latter part of the night, when all became still.

"We started out to look them up and bring them in any time from daylight until the dew was off the grass, and always found them in some secluded spot, lying down chewing their cuds, showing that the latter part of the night is the time for rest and recuperation of the bovine species.

"But we have further evidence of this fact. Our cows, whether they grazed during the night on the range or stayed on the premises, waiting for their meal and bran at milking time, could always be seen at daylight lying down resting and chewing their cuds, and we take it that anyone who has had the handling and care of domestic animals, particularly horses and cattle, knows that the latter part of the night, extending up to daylight, is the time they have for sleep and rest and the supplying of the nerve centers with nervous energy for the requirements of the coming day.

"We may give another concrete illustration of the necessity that exists for cattle to have sleep and rest the latter part of the night. In 1858, when a boy of 15, I drove an ox team for the Government freight contractors hauling freight from Fort Leavenworth to Forts Kearney and Laramie for the Utah expedition, under Gen. Andrew Sidney Johnston; there were 8 to 10 oxen in a team, and a train was made up of 25 to 30 teams; this teaming was mainly during the summer months, and we herded our stock of nights to let them graze. There were two details, the first up to midnight, and the second from midnight to daylight, when the stock was driven in.

"Now, by 1 and 2 o'clock the animals were generally filled up with grass, and their activities commenced to flag, and in a short time they were lying down to rest, and soon were chewing their cuds, and continued in this state of relaxation until they were aroused the next morning and driven into camp.

"Every veteran of the Civil War who belonged to the Cavalry and did much night marching will easily recall that just before daybreak the flagging energy of his horse and inclination to stumble, as if half asleep was noticeable, and as it is generally known that that is the time when the horse gets his sleep and rest, he should not be disturbed, unless an emergency exists for it.

"Kind treatment of our domestic animals should be encouraged everywhere, and that this fact is generally recognized is shown by the enactment in nearly all the States of laws for the prevention of cruelty to animals.

"The lives of men and animals through countless ages have been adjusted to sun time and to daylight conditions, except some species, whose eyes and life-serving functions have been adjusted to night conditions and sleep and rest during the day.

"We have said that the farmers were opposed to the so-called daylight-saving law; let us see why: They rise at daylight, and work and do their chores until the dusk of evening, which they consider affords hours enough for any man to work; and requiring them to rise an hour or so before daylight adds that much time to the cost of heat and light, besides the many inconveniences it entails stumbling around in the dark or carrying a lantern about their barns and stables to wake up and feed their resting stock, and that it also unduly increases their tired feeling when night comes.

"The good farmer, like the good housewife, finds something to do from daylight to dark, and to disturb this adjustment brings an increased burden upon him to satisfy the whims of a few faddists whose useful employment can not be said would add very much to the sum of human happiness.

"There are doubtless a good many farmers who do not keep hired help and who may continue to use natural time; but there are also a good many who will be obliged to adjust themselves to the new time in order to save themselves from losses in the sale and disposal of their products.

"A farmer who sells milk or any products that he ships to any dealer in the city must rise an hour earlier than usual to have his milk or produce at the station to meet the new schedules of the railroads or interurban lines, and is thus placed at a disadvantage, inconvenience, and put to an unnecessary cost in managing his business to meet a change of time, the syllabus of which states an untruth, a change, too, for which there was no demand except from a few faddists.

"WILEY BRITTON."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I voted for the bill originally and I voted for the repeal of the legislation, and I am going to vote for it now. I will state my principal reason for doing so.

The dividing line between eastern time and central time for years had been at Pittsburgh. The clock was advanced one hour under the daylight-saving law. Later on the line between central time and eastern time was moved westwardly from Pittsburgh to Mansfield, Ohio, a distance of about 200 miles or more. The result is that in the eastern half of Ohio, as well as in the western part of Pennsylvania, it makes a difference of two hours in time, and I see no reason why that condition should prevail any longer.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, only a word. I shall vote against the bill. It has been really a very valuable change for the urban and industrial populations of a State like mine, and I have thought that the experiment was a good one.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me that those who oppose it, and who refer, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] did, to the sun time, forget that a new day has dawned. It was a good old sun in its day. The world liked the sun's time for a long time, but we have outgrown it, as you know. Human nature has changed, and the time has come to go to something better than the sun. The sun occupies very much the position of George Washington. He was an excellent man in his day, but he has been outgrown, and the principles he laid down are no longer to be considered. The time of the sun has become old-fashioned. I think we should cling to it, and I have a strong suspicion that we shall end by clinging to the principles of George Washington.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I raised the point of order that this is the same legislation that was defeated on another bill during the present session of Congress. It is true that the legislation which attempted to repeal the law embraced two other sections. Therefore I have no complaint to make with the ruling of the Chair on the point of order. I call the attention of the Senate, nevertheless, to the ground upon which the former legislation was repealed. It was on the ground that they were changing time back to the normal time. This attempts to accomplish exactly the same purpose. The President vetoed the Agricultural appropriation bill for that very reason. If he is consistent he will veto this bill for exactly that reason. He vetoed the Agricultural appropriation bill because it attempted to repeal section 3 of the daylight-saving act. This bill attempts to repeal section 3 of the daylight-saving act, just the same as it was done in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The purpose of this act is identical with the purpose of the amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill. The other two sections that were added to the Agricultural appropriation bill have nothing to do with daylight saving. They simply reaffirm or establish astronomical time in five zones of the United States. That was not objectionable to the President, but section 3, which advanced the clock one hour under the former act, was attempted to be repealed on the Agricultural appropriation bill, and that he objected to. As I said, this act is intended to accomplish exactly the same purpose.

I take it that the wishes of Congress have been ascertained on this matter by a veto of the President and the failure of Congress by a two-thirds vote to carry it over the veto. In spite of having that question absolutely settled during the present session of Congress, we are now attempting to accomplish the same thing that has been determined at this session according to the laws of the country.

We all know well enough that you might attempt to reach the same subject in another bill after this bill is vetoed, and in still another bill, by changing it to some extent; but the substance of the act is the same, and there is not a Senator here who does not believe that the President will act in exactly the same manner that he did act, and that the same question will come back to the Senate on overruling or sustaining the veto that arose on the Agricultural appropriation bill.

I wish to place in my remarks, without reading it, the veto message of the President when this same matter came up before.

The message referred to is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I take the liberty of returning H. R. 3157, "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920," without my signature.

I realize, of course, the grave inconvenience which may arise from the postponement of this legislation at this time, but feel obliged to withhold my signature because of the clause which provides that "at and after 2 o'clock antemeridian on Sunday, October 26, 1919, next, the act entitled 'An act to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States,' approved March 19, 1918, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

I believe that the repeal of the act referred to would be a very grave inconvenience to the country, and I think that I am justified in saying that it would constitute something more than an inconvenience. It would involve a serious economic loss. The act of March 19, 1918, to "save daylight" resulted not only from a careful study of industrial conditions by competent men familiar with the business operations of the country, but also from observation of the happy and beneficial consequences of similar legislation in other countries where legislation of this character has been for some time in operation, and where it has resulted, as the act of March 19, 1918, has resulted in the United States, in substantial economies. That act was intended to place the chief business activities of the country as nearly as might be within the limits of daylight throughout the year. It resulted in very great economies of fuel and in substantial economies of energy, because of the very different effect of work done in the daylight and work done by artificial light. It, moreover, served the daily convenience of the many communities of the country in a way which gave all but universal satisfaction, and the overwhelming testimony of its value which has come to me convinces me that I should not be justified in acquiescing in its repeal.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
11 July, 1919.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CUMMINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "yea."

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], who is absent, but on this question I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], who is not present. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and being informed that he is absent I will refrain from voting.

Mr. GAY (when Mr. RANSDELL'S name was called). I desire to state that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR (when Mr. SHIELDS'S name was called). I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on important business.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I inquire whether the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote "nay." I understand the junior Senator from Maine would also vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. Not knowing how he would vote, I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I am in favor of the bill, and if I were allowed to vote I would vote "yea." I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and, unless I can secure a transfer of my pair, I shall refrain from voting.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I note that my pair, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has now voted. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and let my vote stand.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], with whom I have a pair, would vote as I would. Therefore I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] on official business. He has a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I am informed that if my colleague were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] on official business.

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] has entered the Chamber and voted, but I am advised that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], if present, would vote as I have voted. Therefore I will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—41.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 1, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, confronted with a feeling of unrest throughout the world, which has reached the people of our own beloved country, we pray that the authorities in this Capital City in all branches of our Republic may strive earnestly to adjust every difficulty in accordance with the traditions and genius of our Nation.

With the largest crops in the history of our country, prices are beyond reason and common sense and the people look for speedy relief; and we pray most fervently that a league of nations, not the league before the Senate and the people of the United States, but a peace league founded upon the highest moral conceptions and religious truths, may spring spontaneously from the hearts of all peoples of all the world; that war may be assigned to the limbo of the past, where it belongs. In God's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PROTECTION OF COASTWISE TRADE.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 216.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order for the House to consider H. R. 7500, a bill "To protect the coastwise trade of the United States, and for other purposes." That debate on said bill shall be limited to 1 hour and 30 minutes, one-half to be controlled by those in favor of the bill, one-half by those opposed to the bill. That during said debate amendments may be offered, to be voted upon in the order in which they are offered at the conclusion of such debate. That at the conclusion of the debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on all amendments and the bill to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

In line 5, strike out the words "and 30 minutes," so that the line will read: Debate on said bill shall be limited to one hour, to be controlled," etc.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the previous question shall be ordered and agreed to, there will then be 20 minutes on a side on the rule?

Mr. SNELL. Well, it was not the intention to have any debate on the rule itself proper, unless there is some demand from the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is a right under the parliamentary situation.

Mr. SNELL. I was just going to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. As far as I know, there is no desire to debate the rule on this side.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Well, the gentleman has not consulted with me at all. I do desire to debate it during the 20 minutes.

Mr. POU. Neither has the gentleman consulted with me at all.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Surely, I did not know the Rules Committee was acting on the matter.

Mr. POU. All right.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. KAHN. To ask a question. This is a very important bill. I do not oppose the repealing of the coastwise law, but there is a situation in the West on the Pacific coast with respect to Hawaii that I think the House should thoroughly understand, and I will ask those in charge of the bill whether I can have 15 minutes of the hour's time to explain the thing to the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I believe we ought to have a quorum here on this matter, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman withhold that a minute?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I withhold it for the present.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman from New York if he would not be willing to take the 40 minutes that usually goes with the so-called debate on the rule, and never is, and add it to the time provided in the rule?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Making it an hour and 40 minutes to be equally divided.

Mr. SNELL. We will agree to that.

Mr. POU. I have no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be included in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the rule be amended by adding 40 minutes to the general debate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I suppose that the rule provides that the time be equally divided?

The SPEAKER. Yes; and it is understood that debate on the rule is to be omitted.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is all right. The rule provides the time shall be equally divided between those in favor and those opposed to the bill?

Mr. SNELL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is on adopting the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order there is no quorum present, and obviously there is not.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Andrews, Md.	Fitzgerald	Longworth	Sanders, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A day or two ago I was granted unanimous consent to address the House for 35 minutes this morning. I want to ask if I may be recognized now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has forgotten the wording of the unanimous consent. The Chair recollects that unanimous consent was given subject to business on the Speaker's table and privileged business. Was not that the fact?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My request was worded so as to provide that consent should be given to me after the reading of the Journal and disposal of such business as was on the Speaker's desk. I assume the RECORD so shows.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was not here when the reading of the Journal was completed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true, Mr. Speaker, but I call the attention of the Speaker and the House to the fact that the House met at an unusual hour this morning, and I temporarily had forgotten that the House met at 11 o'clock. I came in here very shortly after the roll began, and there has really been no time lost.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that technically, inasmuch as this rule has been adopted in the absence of the gentleman, the gentleman's right would be superseded by the rule. But the gentleman might now ask unanimous consent. Of course, the Chair does not know whether or not it would be granted.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, as I stated the other day, it has always been the uniform practice that a statement on the subject of appropriations be made by the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, and since I was granted this leave the other day I wish to ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed now for 35 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed 35 minutes on the subject of appropriations. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, could not the gentleman get in on the debate on this bill? We have increased the limit of time to 1 hour and 40 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understood the debate was confined to the bill. I do not know whether the gentlemen will have time to yield me or not. I hope the gentleman will not object to this request.

Mr. SNELL. I do not want to do so, but I had hoped that the gentleman could get in under general debate.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. We have not the time to yield in general debate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Texas states he has not the time. I hope there will be no objection to my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee to proceed now for 35 minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield, not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads over telegraph and telephone legislation. It is a brief argument prepared by myself for the guidance of the House, if the subject ever comes up again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the argument referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me to submit a request?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill before the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following resignation, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. FREDERICK GILLETT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have this day tendered my resignation as a Representative in Congress from the seventh congressional district of the State of South Carolina to the governor of said State, the same to take effect August 1, 1919.

Cordially, yours, A. F. LEVER.

APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it has always been the custom for the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations to submit some remarks with reference to appropriations during the session. By way of explanation I wish to say that I would have submitted these remarks at an earlier date had it not been for the fact that for a week or more the House has been engaged in the consideration of the prohibition-enforcement legislation and other important matters.

I wish to make a connected statement, and shall therefore ask the indulgence of the House that I be not interrupted until after I have concluded, at which time, if I have the time, I will be very glad to yield to any Member.

At the close of the Sixty-fifth Congress, on March 4, 1919, six of the supply bills carrying appropriations for governmental activities for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1919, had not been enacted into law. These were the bills making appropriation for the sundry civil expenses, the Agricultural and the Indian Service, the District of Columbia, and the Army and the Navy. In addition to this, the deficiency bill and the appropriation for the Railroad Administration also failed to become law. The country is familiar with the reasons why these bills were not enacted before the expiration of that term of Congress. All of them were passed by a Democratic House in ample time to have become law, but they were killed in the Senate by the filibuster of Republican minority Senators, who deliberately planned and carried on the filibuster for political purposes, and with the avowed purpose of compelling the President to call an early extra session in order to provide funds for the fiscal year 1919–20. It was stated that the desire for an early extra session was in order that reconstruction legislation might be quickly undertaken, but everyone knows that the real reason underlying the filibuster was to force, if possible, the President's return from Paris before he had completed framing the peace treaty which was to insure the peace of the world and to enable our boys to quickly return home. If the desire for reconstruction legislation was its real purpose, why is it that now, after a session of only two months, the Republican majority in Congress has decided to take a five-week recess with this legislation not enacted? If it was considered so important last spring as to demand an immediate extra session, why take a long recess now before it is enacted? They have passed the appropriation bills which were defeated at the last session by the filibuster, and having started certain fishing political investigations, with the hope that something may turn up which will be of advantage to their party, they are now anxious to take a long recess and permit this important legislation to await their own good pleasure.

Ours is a government by majority, and a deliberate filibuster by a minority can seldom be justified, but certainly no filibuster was ever more unjustifiable and more deserving of rebuke by the people than the one which resulted in the defeat of these appropriation bills. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It was not actuated by opposition to the pending bills, but by a purpose wholly foreign to them. For my part I believe that the President should have gone to Paris, but, waiving that question, the fact remains that he had the right to go, and that he was actually there as the head of our Nation and in the midst of the negotiations and could not leave without sacrificing many of those things for which our country stands and for which our brave boys sacrificed their lives. And this filibuster on the part of members of the opposite party, and consequent defeat of these bills, was only one of many things which were done to hamper and embarrass him while he was engaged in formulating peace terms which were to bring to a close the greatest war of all the ages.

As a result the President called the new Congress into extra session on May 19 in order that these bills might be enacted into law before the beginning of the fiscal year and the necessary funds provided to carry on the Government. All of these bills have now been enacted into law. It will be illuminating to compare the amounts carried in these bills as passed by a Republican Congress with the amounts proposed by a Democratic House in the last Congress for exactly similar services and for the same fiscal year.

A few days ago the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, presented to the House a carefully prepared statement in which he undertook to analyze the appropriations which have been made and to compare them with those proposed at the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress. Had he followed the usual custom and presented an impartial comparison of the amounts appropriated by this Congress with those passed by a Democratic House at the last session, I would have nothing to say. Personally I have a very warm and high regard for the gentleman from Iowa. We are personal friends, and I know that he would not intentionally misrepresent any fact or do anyone an injustice, but he sometimes permits his intense eagerness to serve his party to warp his judgment. And I regret that in this instance he forgot that he was speaking to the Congress and to the country as the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations but permitted himself to be drawn off in an effort to secure a partisan advantage for his party rather than present a fair comparison of the appropriations made at this and the last session. In reply to the gentleman I shall show by a brief analysis of the various bills that this session has increased the charges on the Treasury by a number of millions of dollars for the ordinary running expenses of the Government over the amount proposed by a Democratic House at the last session.

The gentleman from Iowa asserted that—

> The net result of the work of this Congress, so far as it has acted on appropriations, notwithstanding the necessarily large increases for war-risk insurance, shows a net decrease of $939,629,541.97 in the appropriations made by this Congress as compared with the last action of the Sixty-fifth Congress on the same bills. But if the saving made by this Congress in the matter of appropriations is measured by the amounts asked for by the executive departments and considered by this Congress the aggregate is $1,685,837,893.64, a magnificent record of achievement in 37 legislative days.

The gentleman failed to state that the speed with which these bills were put through was made possible only by the fact that extensive hearings were conducted on all of these bills at the last session and that these hearings and the bills then prepared were made the basis for the bills introduced at this session, and that, as a matter of fact, the greater portion of the items of appropriation then proposed were accepted without question. He knows full well that if it had not been for that fact it would have been impossible to have prepared and passed these bills within the time stated.

He also, by his comparison, seeks to show that the combined amounts proposed in these bills at the last session greatly exceeded the amounts appropriated at this session. He forgets that every Member of his party in the House voted for these bills at the last session, and that he, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, helped to frame a number of them, and his claim, by inference, that they were unduly large is a severe indictment of himself and his party in not having opposed them and called the attention of the country to them at the time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows that the reductions to which he refers were made in three appropriations alone, that of the Army, the Navy, and the Shipping Board or Emergency Fleet Corporation, which I shall presently show should not be considered on account of a change in conditions since the last session of Congress, and that, eliminating these, the Republican majority in the present session has actually increased by millions of dollars the appropriations made by a Democratic majority in the House at the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress for exactly similar services for the fiscal year 1920. And this despite the widely heralded program of economy which the Republican Party announced that it proposed to institute in behalf of the burdened taxpayers. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party can no more change its old habit of extravagance in spending the public revenues than a leopard can change its spots.

The gentleman from Iowa realized this, and he, therefore, resorted to the unheard of argument of claiming a saving of more than a billion and one-half dollars, because the appropriations are that much less than the estimates submitted. He knows that many of these estimates were war-time estimates, and he also knows that there has never been a session of Congress under either Republican or Democratic administrations that the appropriations actually made were not far less than the estimates submitted. If I had the time, I could cite instances of this in every session of Congress, and numerous instances where Democratic Congresses have made equally as great reductions in the estimates submitted. But this would get us nowhere, for it would neither be illuminating or conclusive as to whether Congress had shown proper economy, and I am sure that not even the gentleman from Iowa will seriously insist that it is a just or fair claim.

As another evidence of the unfairness of the gentleman's statement, let me call attention to the fact that in referring to appropriations proposed by the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, he did not take the appropriations as actually passed by the House, but he chose rather to use the figures as reported by a committee of the Senate, after the bills had passed the House and been messaged to the Senate. Everyone knows that the report of the committee, consisting of both Democrats and Republicans, was by no means binding on the Senate, to say nothing of the House. It so happened that the amounts reported by the Senate committee were largely in excess of the amounts provided by the House and hence the committee figures were used. I do not recall but one instance since I have been in Congress that the House did not largely reduce the appropriations passed by the Senate, and the gentleman can not hold a Democratic majority in the Sixty-fifth Congress responsible for what some Senate committee may have reported. The only fair and just comparison is to take the bills as they actually passed this body and not as reported by the committee.

The gentleman from Iowa, using the figures as reported by the Senate committee instead of those contained in the bill as it actually passed the House, states that this Congress has appropriated over $400,000,000 less for Army purposes than was proposed at the last session. Now, what are the real facts? The Army bill of the last session was prepared in January and February of this year, but a little over two short months after the signing of the armistice. At that time it was expected that there would be sufficient troops in France and this country after July 1 and for several months thereafter to make it necessary to provide for an average Army of 509,000 men during the fiscal year 1920. I do not mean that it was contemplated retaining an Army of that size, but this was the average number of soldiers which it was believed would have to be provided for. The number would be larger during the first of the fiscal year and decrease as demobilization proceeded. Hence the bill prepared and passed by the House at the last session provided sufficient funds to maintain an average Army of 509,000 men. But when Congress met in extra session in May it was found that the rapidity with which our men were being returned and discharged had exceeded former expectations and that it would be necessary to provide for an average Army of only 325,000 men. This explains the large difference in the two appropriations, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, if there was any saving it was due to a Democratic administration's efficiency in bringing our soldiers back and not to any action of economy of a Republican Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Ah, Mr. Speaker, why did not my friend, in the interest of fairness, state these facts when he made claim that this Congress had reduced the Army appropriations for next year by over $400,000,000 from the sum which was proposed at the last session? The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who was ranking Republican on the Military Affairs Committee last session, and who as such gave the former bill his support, and who is now chairman of the committee, frankly admitted this to be true, and said in justification of the former bill that:

> The committee was justified at that time in appropriating for that number (509,000 men) because it seemed to the committee that it would not be possible to demobilize our forces as rapidly as they have been demobilized.

A splendid tribute from a high Republican source to the efficiency of a Democratic administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As a matter of fact, even had the larger sum been appropriated, it would not have been spent, because it could have been used only for the support of the soldiers, and since they have been so rapidly demobilized that there will not be an average of 509,000 men next year, the balance would have remained in the Treasury.

The same is true of the naval bill. The gentleman from Iowa compares the amount appropriated at this session of Congress for naval purposes with the amount recommended to the Senate at the last session by a Senate committee, composed of both Democrats and Republicans, and who unanimously agreed on the report. Everyone knows that the House would never have agreed to that report. Why did he not, therefore, use the amount as passed by the House? It would have been fairer and represented the judgment of 435 Members, rather than the judgment of a very few Senators on the Senate committee. The reason is obvious.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I regret that I can not yield.

Mr. TOWNER. This is a question that I think the gentleman ought to answer.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman after I get through. I can not yield unless the gentleman can assure me more time. I will yield later to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The bill as it passed the House at the last session carried $720,693,000.33, while the Senate committee reported $824,708,521.88, or over $104,000,000 more. But take his own figures. Is there any real saving? Not at all. The reduction in the bill passed at this session was made possible solely by a change of conditions and events occurring since the adjournment of the last Congress. I quote as authority for the statement no less a person than the able chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], who is one of the most beloved and respected men in this House. The bill which previously passed the House carried appropriations for the construction of new vessels and an enlisted strength of 225,000 men.

In the bill which passed at this session the new construction of vessels was eliminated on the advice and suggestion of a Democratic Secretary of the Navy, and it provides for an average enlisted strength of 193,000 men. But let me say just here that the reductions carried in the bill passed at the present session, and which were made possible by the elimination of new construction and for arms and armament, are temporary, and additional appropriations for those purposes will have to be made later on by this Congress. So, again, we find that if there is any saving in this bill, it is due to a change of condition since the adjournment of Congress in March and to a Democratic administration, and not, as the gentleman from Iowa would have the country understand, to the economy of a Republican Congress.

The Agricultural bill as it passed the House at the last session carried $31,691,562 for the next fiscal year. The bill as it passed this session for the same year and for exactly the same services carries $33,869,761, or an increase of $2,178,199 over the sum proposed by a Democratic House at the last session. And yet the gentleman from Iowa in his speech refrained from even mentioning the appropriations made by the House at the last session, but chose rather to make his comparison with the figures reported by a committee to the Senate, and which was not even binding on the Senate, to say nothing of the House.

The bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia as passed at this session carries $15,364,421. The gentleman refers to the fact that it passed the Senate at the last session carrying $14,446,364, but he forgot to mention that this same bill also passed the House at the last session, and that it only carried the sum of $14,093,701. Since it was thrown into conference and never became a law, it would certainly have been as fair to refer to the figures of the House as it was to the figures of the Senate. He chooses, however, the larger figures, but even then he is bound to concede that the bill passed by this Congress carries $918,057 more for the next fiscal year for the same services than the amount fixed by the Senate at the last session. And if you compare it with the amount appropriated by the House at the last session, it represents an increase of $1,270,720. He takes some solace in the fact that the bill as it passed this session is $271,280 less than the estimates. Since he saw fit to refer to estimates, why not tell the whole story and show that the bill as it passed the House at the last session reduced the estimates in the sum of $1,835,018? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There was appropriated by this Congress for sundry civil expenses the sum of $605,160,207.95. Of this amount the sum of $356,000,000 was for the Shipping Board or Emergency Fleet Corporation, leaving $249,160,207.25 for all other expenses. This bill was passed by the House at the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, carrying $851,171,859.25. Of this amount $660,903,254 was for the Shipping Board, leaving $190,268,605.25 for all other services. Leaving out, therefore, the appropriations for the Shipping Board, which I will presently show should be done, it will be found that the Republican majority in this Congress actually appropriated for sundry civil expenses for the fiscal year 1920 the sum of $58,891,602 more than was appropriated by a Democratic House in the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress for the same services and for the same fiscal year. The gentleman from Iowa refers to the fact that the bill passed at this session carries a greater sum for the War Risk Bureau. That is true, but even if you omit the appropriation carried for this service in both bills you will still find that the bill as it passed this session has increased the amount carried in the bill which was passed by the House at the last session by the sum of $13,891,602. This is a striking contradiction of the claim made by the Republican Party that it has entered on an era of close economy.

In this statement I have not charged the majority party with the sum of $8,000,000 which was added to the bill after the veto of the President, in order to provide proper subsistence and training for those of our soldiers who were wounded and disabled in their service for our country during the war. I thought it unfair to do so, because they denied this sum in the bill as it first passed, and it was only through the veto of the President and the efforts of the Democratic minority that it was made possible to do this act of justice to those who fought so bravely in behalf of our flag and who suffered disabilities resulting in a decrease of their earning capacity.

I have said that for the purpose of this comparison the appropriations made for the Shipping Board should not be considered. There was appropriated by the House at the last session the sum of $660,903,254 for this service, while the present Congress appropriated the sum of $356,000,000, or a difference of over $304,000,000. But this represents no real decrease. It is simply a saving on paper and will not save one cent of the public revenues. In order to make this showing on paper, the bill passed at this session makes available certain sums which otherwise would have gone into the Treasury. For instance, since the last session of Congress a large number of wooden ships and ships of slow-going type have been sold, and it is contemplated selling more in the future, and the sum so derived will amount to many millions of dollars. Then it has been found that the operation of ships is proving profitable. Sixty millions of dollars will probably be received from this source during this fiscal year. Then there has been heretofore appropriated many millions of dollars for working capital in the operation of ships, and it was found that there was $118,000,000 of a former appropriation for the purchase of ships which has not been and will not be used. The bill as it passed at the last session contemplated that these sums would be covered into the Treasury and made a direct appropriation out of the Treasury of the amount which was believed would be needed for this service. But not so with this Congress. It had to make a record for economy by a seeming reduction of the former appropriation. Hence it made these sums available for ship construction, and thereby reduced the appropriation carried in the bill to that extent. I repeat there was no saving to the people, for every dollar belongs to the people, and it makes no difference, in so far as the Treasury is concerned, whether the money is appropriated directly out of the Treasury or whether it is taken from a fund which would otherwise be paid into the Treasury. Such a practice, however, can not be too severely criticized, for it has a tendency to mislead the people and conceal from them the amount that is actually being appropriated, something a Democratic House sought to avoid by permitting these sums to be paid into the Treasury and then making a direct appropriation of the sum which was needed.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] further stated that there had been a reduction made in the appropriation for the Indian Service of $326,400, comparing the amount as passed at this session with the amount of the bill as it passed the Senate. The gentleman overlooked the fact that the Indian bill passed the House and was messaged to the Senate and passed the Senate and went to conference, and the conferees actually agreed upon a report, and that report of the conference committee was adopted by the House, carrying $43,509.78 less than the amount appropriated at this session for the Indian Service. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In other words, the total appropriation made by the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, as agreed to in conference and adopted by the House, was $10,941,587.25, whereas the total appropriation made at this session for the Indian Service, and standing as a charge upon the Treasury, is $10,985,097.03, or a difference, as I stated, of $43,509.78.

An analysis of all these bills shows that the filibuster in the Senate last March cost the Treasury of the United States more than $62,000,000 in appropriations alone, for this Congress has increased to that extent the amounts carried for ordinary expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1920, in the sundry civil, Agricultural, District of Columbia, and Indian appropriation bills, and if you deduct the total amount provided for the war risk, it will still be found that the appropriations in these four bills for ordinary services of the Government have been increased more than $16,000,000. These bills would have been enacted into law had it not been for that filibuster, and an extra session would not have been necessary to pass them, and this Congress would not have had the opportunity to increase them.

Let me say, further, that in order to make a record before the people at this particular time for economy, appropriations which were manifestly and clearly necessary to carry on certain governmental activities during the present fiscal year have been cut below the amount necessary, with the idea that they can be taken care of in deficiency bills to be passed later on. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Everyone recognizes that it is poor policy and wasteful extravagance to invite deficiencies, but I charge that this has been done, and I could cite a number of instances to prove it. The deficiency bills to be passed later on at this session and the next session will prove it, and I shall take occasion at that time to call them to the attention of Congress and the country.

The gentleman from Iowa called attention to the fact that there was a failure to enact many of the appropriation laws before the beginning of the fiscal year for which the appropriations were made and that it was therefore necessary to pass continuing resolutions in certain sessions of the Forty-fourth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-third, Sixty-second, Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses. I have examined the records and I find that both branches of Congress were Republican in the Forty-seventh and Fifty-first Congresses and Democratic in the Fifty-third, Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses.

The country is entirely familiar with the fact that it was the filibuster which was carried on in the Senate last March which prevented the enactment of certain appropriation bills in the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress. In the Sixty-third and Sixty-fourth Congresses the Democratic Party was in control of the Government for the first time after a long period and both the House and the Senate were engaged in the consideration of a number of most important and progressive measures, the need of which had long been apparent, and this fact delayed the passage of certain appropriation bills for a short period. But in the Forty-fourth, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-second, and Sixty-second Congresses, the House was Democratic and the Senate Republican. With the exception of the fortifications bill in the Forty-eighth Congress, the fortifications and sundry civil bills in the Forty-ninth, and the fortifications bill in the Fiftieth Congress, all of the appropriation bills in these Congresses were passed by a Democratic House before the beginning of the fiscal year and in ample time to have been passed upon by the Republican Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Some of these bills were passed by the House from three to five months before the beginning of the fiscal year and their failure to become a law at the proper time must rest with the Republican Senate and not the Democratic House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I shall append to my remarks a table showing when these bills passed the House, and leave it to an impartial and fair public to pass judgment on the efficiency of the Democratic House and the Republican Senate in those Congresses.

Let me remind the gentleman and his party colleagues that they can no longer make use of the old threadbare and false arguments as to the inefficiency of the Democratic Party, which we were accustomed to hear in the years gone by. They can not fool the people as to the record of the party. For six years it had control of both the administrative and legislative branches of our Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It stayed on the job and made a record for efficiency which the Republican Party has never equaled. I lay it down as a fact which can not be contradicted that during those years more wise and progressive measures of real value to the people were placed on the statute books than during the whole time the Republican Party was in control of the Government. Among the measures passed were the Federal reserve banking act, which took the control of our finances from Wall Street and gave it to the people to whom it belongs. It passed the Federal farm-loan act for the benefit of the farmers, the only measure ever passed for the primary benefit of the farming classes with the exception of the law providing for rural free delivery of the mails. It passed the income-tax law, which has equalized the burdens of taxation and made wealth bear its just proportion of the expenses of government. It has created a merchant marine in the interest of our commerce.

It has passed legislation in behalf of good roads, and for the first time in more than half a century the Federal Government is now extending substantial aid to the States in the building of highways. It created the parcel post for the benefit of the consumers. It provided a system of cheap insurance for our soldiers and sailors in the Great War and made provision for the support of their dependents while they were engaged in the service of their country, and has made it possible for those who were wounded or disabled in the service to receive a vocational training in some useful occupation or calling. It entered upon a constructive naval program, and has made it possible to provide adequate naval protection to our Pacific as well as our Atlantic coast. These but constitute a part of the constructive measures enacted by a Democratic Congress and under a Democratic administration.

But above all and beyond all, Mr. Speaker, this Great War was fought to a successful conclusion under a Democratic administration. The speed and thoroughness with which our country made ready to meet the issues of the war, and the efficiency with which its vast problems were handled, were equaled only by the splendid courage of our soldiers and the sacrifices made by our citizenship. The world recognizes the great and glorious part which our country took in bringing the war to a successful conclusion, and the petty faultfinding and criticism which is heard in our midst and nowhere else will be forgotten in the glorious record of the achievement of our country, which is acclaimed in every land. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include the statement to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to insert a statement to which he has referred. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the statement referred to:

ANNUAL APPROPRIATION LAWS (WITH DATES OF APPROVAL AND DATES OF PASSAGE BY THE HOUSE) WHICH WERE NOT ENACTED IN TIME TO BE EFFECTIVE FROM THE FIRST DAY OF THE FISCAL YEAR.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 662. An act to amend section 107 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as heretofore amended;

S. 687. An act to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property;

S. 767. An act for the relief of the heirs of W. H. Sneed, deceased;

S. 257. An act for the relief of certain officers in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes;

S. 219. An act for the relief of Kate Canniff;

S. 2250. An act providing for the exchange of certain legation buildings and grounds owned by the Government of the United States in Bangkok, Siam; and

S. 1375. An act for the relief of Catherine Grace.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. WALSH of Montana and Mr. FRANCE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Interior Department.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 767. An act for the relief of the heirs of W. H. Sneed, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 687. An act to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 662. An act to amend section 107 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as heretofore amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 219. An act for the relief of Kate Canniff; to the Committee on Claims.

PROTECTION OF COASTWISE TRADE.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule which has been adopted, the bill before the House is H. R. 7500, to protect the coastwise trade of the United States, and for other purposes; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is recognized for 50 minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, is it understood that the time is awarded to the gentleman from Massachusetts in favor of the bill and to myself to control the time in opposition?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes; to control the time in opposition.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7500) to protect the coastwise trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act giving the United States Shipping Board power to suspend present provisions of law and permit vessels of foreign registry and foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under the act of August 18, 1914, to engage in the coastwise trade during the present war and for a period of 120 days thereafter, except the coastwise trade with Alaska," approved October 6, 1917, is repealed.

SEC. 2. That vessels of foreign registry and foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under the act entitled "An act to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes," approved August 18, 1914, may carry passengers from or to ports in the Territory of Hawaii to or from ports in the United States, except ports in Alaska, upon special permits issued by the collector of customs for the district in which is situated the port of embarkation. Such permits shall be granted only upon payment to the collector of a fee of $40 for each passenger so carried. Such fees shall be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce shall jointly make regulations necessary for the issuance of such permits.

Whenever the President is satisfied that vessels of the United States, other than those admitted to American registry under such act of August 18, 1914, are engaged in trade between such ports in sufficient numbers to accommodate the passenger trade between such ports he shall so declare by proclamation, and thereafter this section shall cease to be in effect.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "registry," insert a comma, and in line 9 of page 2 strike out the word "Such" and insert the words "After July 1, 1920, such."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this bill was referred to a subcommittee of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, who held hearings on the bill. That subcommittee consisted of four Republicans and three Democrats. There was no opposition shown in the hearings, and no opposition came from the committee. The subcommittee unanimously reported the bill to the committee, and upon consideration in the committee, after a debate of considerable length, most of the time being occupied by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], who opposed the bill, the bill was finally reported to the House, with but one opposition vote. The rest of the committee of both parties were in favor of reporting the bill as presented to the House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] was authorized to file minority views.

I do not wish to occupy further time, but I will yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT], the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the act of August 18, 1914, referred to in this bill the Panama Canal act?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It is not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says it is not?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that the act that was brought into the House when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] was chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to give foreign vessels the right to enter the coastwise trade?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes. This bill repeals that act and also grants relief to the citizens of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, at the outset I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the bill H. R. 7500, which the Committee on the Merchant Marine have reported to you gentlemen, repeals the so-called war-time coastwise-trade law, making an exception in the instance of the Hawaiian Islands, extending the war-time provisions of the law to the islands until July 1, 1920, prescribing a penalty for its extension after that time in order to take care of a situation which the committee unanimously felt was entitled to the consideration of this House.

The war-time coastwise-trade law was put on the statute books in order that the United States might utilize to its utmost capacity all of the shipping facilities of the world, including our coastwise trade. The first coastwise law was passed in 1789, 14 years after we became an independent Nation. Since that time it has been the policy of this country to protect our coastwise trade. The result of that has been that when we entered this war we had nearly 7,000,000 dead-weight tons of shipping in our coastwise trade.

After we entered the war it was discovered that other countries were not allowing their shipping to go into the danger zone, and we realized the necessity of utilizing every pound of tonnage anywhere in the world. Therefore we passed the war-time coastwise-trade law, that foreign ships which were not being used might be lured into our coastwise trade which was safe. As a result of that legislation approximately 2,000,000 tons of foreign ships came into this trade. Four hundred and forty-one foreign ships came into our coastwise trade with their foreign crews and took advantage of the opportunity which theretofore the United States had reserved to its own citizens. The following foreign ships engaged in this trade:

A large portion of these ships were not operating prior to the time we opened to them our safe coastwise trade; they came and supplanted American-owned ships which went into the overseas trade; many of them were sunk.

Now the necessity for a continuation of this privilege to foreign ships is over. There is no reason why foreign ships should come in and use the trade which the United States and its citizens have built up. Therefore your committee asks that the war-time extension of the coastwise law be repealed and that we resume our prewar condition.

The Shipping Board has canceled all permits and licenses on foreign ships, so Congress is not hampered in this respect by continuing permits which would preclude the immediate purpose of this legislation.

I do not anticipate that this House will oppose the resumption of prewar conditions. The record of our coastwise ships is a glorious page in our national history. I do not anticipate that there will be any opposition on either side of the House to a resumption of that very healthy trade condition which resulted in the magnificent coastwise and Great Lakes trade that contributed so largely to the winning of this war. The only opposition I anticipate will be to the provision excluding the Hawaiian Islands from the provisions of this act. The situation there is this: At no time have the Hawaiian Islands had sufficient tonnage to accommodate their passenger trade. They have had sufficient freight tonnage, but never sufficient passenger tonnage.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman does not mean to say that prior to the war they did not have sufficient passenger tonnage?

Mr. SCOTT. I do.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, during the war they have not had, but prior to the war they did have sufficient passenger tonnage.

Mr. SCOTT. The Hawaiian Islands at no time have had sufficient tonnage to accommodate their passenger trade. Of course we can not lose sight of the fact that the Hawaiian Islands are so situated that it might be impossible for us to give them sufficient tonnage to accommodate them for many years to come. The Hawaiian Islands are 2,000 miles from the mainland. On several occasions in the past even members of the Cabinet have found themselves stranded on the Hawaiian Islands, unable to get transportation on American ships, and have been obliged to violate the laws of the United States by taking passage on foreign ships, paying a penalty of $200 and then spending several months in an effort to get themselves exonerated and securing a refund of the penalty. That situation has prevailed for years. The records show that at the present time the Hawaiian Islands have approximately 300 people every week who wish to come from the Islands to the mainland. There is no dispute that at the present time and during the war there has been accommodations on all the lines, American and foreign, for only 50 passengers each week. In other words, 250 passengers per week have been obliged to remain on the Hawaiian Islands in consequence of this lack of accommodation. What we propose to do in this bill is to allow American citizens in the Hawaiian Islands the opportunity to travel on foreign ships without becoming criminals; and in order to protect the coastwise trade after July 1 of next year, which, from the testimony, we considered to be the time when American tonnage ought to get back to take care of that trade, we penalize them 50 per cent of the uniform purchase price of tickets. Certainly no Democrat ought to object to that penalty of 50 per cent which is a reduction of 75 per cent and no Republican ought to object to it, because it is the highest protective tariff we have ever insisted upon.

Mr. KRAUS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Very gladly.

Mr. KRAUS. Is it not anticipated that by the enactment of this legislation the Shipping Board will have a better market for the tonnage which it desires to sell?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman is correct, but I did not intend to discuss that proposition. I felt that the Members of the House were fully informed. I think Members on both sides of the House know that the United States Government is in the shipping business—losing money—and we are trying to get out as rapidly as we can. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, it was understood when the question of discussing the rule came up that I was to have 15 minutes. I find the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] thinks that he should have all the time on his side. I do not know how the gentleman from Michigan feels, but I want to know where I come in.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I will say that when the time was allotted we assumed that in view of the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] and Mr. KAHN were the only opponents—and I do not consider Mr. KAHN as an opponent, but he has an amendment—the two gentlemen were the only two opposed to the bill, I thought that 50 minutes could fairly be distributed between those two when I had four or five men to distribute my time to. I have no objection to the House granting the gentleman from California as much time as he may desire.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to agree with what the gentleman from Michigan says, because it is an apparent misunderstanding. Certainly it was not my thought to diminish the time I would have in the discussion of the bill by any agreement to devote the time usually accorded to the rule to the time on the discussion of the bill. I had no idea that the gentleman from California expected to get any time from me. On the contrary, the gentleman's position is rather adverse to mine.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California may have 15 minutes not to be charged to the time already allotted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time may be extended 15 minutes, and that time be given to the gentleman from California. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, in five minutes I shall not have time to answer the arguments of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY]. I have been doing it about six years in committee. But I just want to call the attention of the committee to a few facts. In the first place, the gentleman spoke to you about freight rates. In the shipping act, passed about four years ago, full authority and power were given to the Shipping Board to prevent, in the shipping business, both coastwise trade and otherwise, and particularly in the coastwise trade, any extortionate rates. That you will find in the shipping act. In the next place, the gentleman speaks of the reservation of the coastwise trade. I will read now from the Department of Commerce Document 119, "Government Aid to Merchant Shipping," published in 1916. It says here:

> The United States, France, Italy, Austro-Hungary, Spain, and Belgium reserve their coasting trade for their own ships. Russia reserves her entire coasting trade, both her Pacific and Atlantic, to her own ships. Portugal reserves her coastal trade to her own ships, and not only that, reserves her African trade to Portuguese vessels.

England does open her coasting trade to foreign vessels, but she accomplishes the same purposes by means of what they call "conference agreements." To show you that they have not, on account of league of nations nor the agreement of amity and equal treatment which is contained in the league of nations, given up this practice, on May 15 Charles J. Pisar, consul at Cape Town, South Africa, sent to the Department of Commerce—and it is published in the Commerce Reports—the following:

NEW SHIPPING AGREEMENT PENDING WITH CONFERENCE LINES.

(Vice Consul Charles J. Pisar, Cape Town, South Africa, May 15, 1919.)

> The Cape Town Chamber of Commerce recently received a communication from its representative in the South African Trade Association (London) announcing that the revival of the shipping agreement between conference lines and merchants is under consideration. A statement has been issued jointly by a number of steamship companies in the South African trade, describing the new proposed agreement. Some interesting points are to be noted in the summary of this statement as published in the Cape Argus of May 10, 1919:
> The former agreement bound the signatory merchants to use the ships of the lines signatory to the agreement in making shipments from the Continent to South African ports. The new proposed agreement leaves them free to use whatever steamship service they choose in shipments from Italy, Portugal, and the Scandinavian countries, and binds them to give their entire support to the British shipping interests for all shipments from ports of the United Kingdom and of the continental coast from Bordeaux to Hamburg, inclusive.
> Provision is made that in case of competition of other lines, resulting in a disturbance of the stability of freight rates, the shipowners will take effective measures in consultation with the South African Trade Association to protect the interests of the signatory shippers. If adjustment is not effected within 14 days to the satisfaction of both parties, any signatory may withdraw from the agreement after 30 days' notice.
> A schedule of rates is drawn up, and the shipowners reserve the right to revise these as conditions may require, but agree not to make any general changes without consultation with the South African Trade Association. In the event of a failure to agree in the matter of alteration of rates, the question in dispute is to be referred to arbitration.

Now, whether England reserves her entire coastwise trade or not, as long as those agreements are in existence—and the examination made of the shipping agreements by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries for years showed that they were in existence all over the world—they protect just as effectively the coastwise trade of England to English ships as our passing this act and protecting our coastwise trade will protect American ships.

The only other argument the gentleman from Texas makes is in regard to shipbuilders. To-day we have 400,000 men engaged in that work, and I think I am fair in saying that they are 98 per cent family men, with possibly families of five or six people dependent on them, engaged in building ships in this country. Back of those are probably 400,000 or 500,000 other men making material for use in shipyards. If it is a vice to protect these men in their labor and their occupation, then I am perfectly willing to vote for the vice. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important question. It is not the first time that it has been up in Congress. For 5 or 6 years up to about 10 years ago efforts were constantly being made to break down the coastwise-trade laws between Hawaii and the mainland. It was always contended that they did not have enough ships to carry the passengers. I always opposed the proposed change, and am happy to say that we successfully defeated it. And what happened? As the result of the defeat of the proposed changes, there were no less than 8 or 10 American ships built, flying the American flag, giving employment to American shipbuilders, American seamen, and American officers, instead of building up the Japanese line. [Applause on the Republican side.]

That is the milk in the coconut of this legislation. The Japanese line pays probably $20 a month to its sailors. They used to pay about $12. Probably wages in Japan have also gone up. But the American ship pays the wages of the home port of the ship, which in this case happens to be San Francisco. The wages of the American sailors on those ships is $65 a month. The officers are paid in proportion. The American officers get a much larger wage than the Japanese officers.

As a result of the continuation of the coastwise law as we had it prior to the war, several companies had built the finest vessels that were afloat on the Pacific. The Matsonia and the Maui have no competitors in the matter of comfort for passengers on the Pacific. When we got into this war, having these American ships, our Government was able to take them over immediately and put them into the transport service in carrying troops across the Atlantic Ocean to France. These ships carried between 3,000 and 4,000 men each on every trip. Outside of the very largest of the German vessels which we took over, they were the best and largest ships we had in our transport service. I rang up the director of transportation of the American Army this morning, Gen. Hines, to find out when those three ships which were taken over will be back in the passenger service between the mainland and Hawaii. The Wilhelmina will arrive in this country in a few days. She is on her last trans-Atlantic trip. She will immediately be returned to her owners, to go into the passenger traffic on the Pacific, and I am assured by the chief of transportation of the Army that the two other ships—the Matsonia and the Maui—will be back in the hands of their owners by the end of this month. They will go back into this business between the mainland and Hawaii. The Matson Co. contemplated building additional American ships when this war broke out. They were stopped in their efforts on account of the war, but I have no doubt that as soon as conditions are again normal this line will put additional American ships into the service between the mainland and the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Long prior to the war the passenger service between Hawaii and ports on the mainland was wholly inadequate, was it not?

Mr. KAHN. No, it was not. Let me make a statement in answer to that. There were probably two months in the year when that service was inadequate, but not greatly inadequate; but during the rest of the year every ship that carried passengers had staterooms that were unoccupied, and when I discussed this matter on the floor of the House some 10 years ago I put into the RECORD, as I recall, lists of the ships that had made the run, showing that they did not have enough passengers to fill their space. The same condition prevails to-day with respect to the railroads. We come from the Pacific coast. There are certain seasons of the year when a passenger, in order to get accommodations for Washington, will have to book two or three weeks in advance. Everything is taken up in the meantime.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman state what is the busy season to Hawaii?

Mr. KAHN. During the summer, when the tourist season is on. We have to wait for our railroad accommodations, and there was a time here in Washington during the war when nobody could get out of Washington just at the time he wanted to leave. He would have to book days and probably weeks in advance in order to get accommodations.

Now, my plea is to build up American ships, build up American lines, employing American seamen, flying the American flag. [Applause.] I ask you to do that instead of building up the Japanese line or any other foreign line of steamships. By having done that in the past, by having defeated this very kind of legislation, we had those American ships, which were immediately taken over by this Government for the transport service the moment we got into the war. If we had passed legislation of this kind prior to the time that the American ships were built, I apprehend no capitalist in this country would have been willing to invest $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 in building American ships in American shipyards for that trade. It costs several million dollars to build one of these ships.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Was it Hawaiian capital or was it mainland capital that made it possible for the American flag to be flying on the Pacific Ocean to-day?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, frankly, there was some Hawaiian capital and there was mainland capital.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Does not the gentleman know that we control the Matson Co. to-day?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know who owns the stock. I do not know who controls the stock of the Matson Co. But, gentlemen, I went to Honolulu 10 years ago. This agitation was on at that time. The Chamber of Commerce of Honolulu were then agitating for this legislation. They invited me to a dinner. I appeared before the Chamber of Commerce of Honolulu and told them to their faces that they ought to be willing to build up the American steamship lines, ships flying the American flag; that they ought to be willing to pay something for being under the American flag. And the agitation stopped immediately and the American ships were built after that period.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the gentleman's specific objection to this bill?

Mr. KAHN. I simply say, let us continue the present conditions until July 1, 1920, and then repeal the law; put a provision in this bill that the law shall be repealed, as to Hawaii, on the 1st of July, 1920; and I guarantee that before the 1st of July, 1920, you will have all the Matson Line ships back again, and you will probably have two or three other ships back again. I am in favor of keeping the American flag on the seas. I do not care about the flag of any other country. [Applause.]

At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to strike out all of section 2, and to allow the present law to continue until the 1st of July, 1920.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Would not the last paragraph on page 2 satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. KAHN. No; it will not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman does not want the law repealed unless there is sufficient accommodation.

Mr. KAHN. The question of what is sufficient accommodation is all a matter of opinion. I may probably think that they have all the ships that are necessary if they have 10 or 12 ships. The President, who believes that Americans should match their wits with the people of foreign countries in the matter of the upbuilding of our commerce without governmental aid of any kind, may not believe that we have sufficient ships if we have 20. I think if we put a provision into the bill stating positively that on July 1, 1920, the existing situation may be changed, we will be serving the interests of Hawaii and the welfare of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the provisions of this bill, if a Hawaiian citizen wishes to travel on a foreign ship after 1920 he is penalized.

Mr. KAHN. Yes. Let me tell you that this is rather a peculiar situation in this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, can I have five minutes to explain the situation alluded to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not want to object; I do not know how much time I am going to have.

Mr. KAHN. If there is to be any objection, I do not want to trespass on the time of the House.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the Delegate from the Hawaiian Islands [Mr. KALANIANAOLE].

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that this bill was presented to Congress and defeated should be corrected. It never has been defeated by Congress. In fact, it passed the House, and the people of Hawaii, after being assured by the Matson Steamship Co. that they were to have another steamer running in a few months, withheld the bill, and it was never presented to the Senate.

So far as the talk about the American flag is concerned, we all believe in it. It is the trade that was created by Hawaii which is the cause of the American flag flying to-day on the Pacific Ocean. [Applause.] You had the American flag on the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., which had the finest and largest steamers afloat on the Pacific Ocean. Where are they to-day? Three of them were sold to the Japanese. Why? I presume you all know the reason.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman knows that the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. did not have the benefit of the coastwise trade law. They were foreign ships running on the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman from Hawaii will yield, that is not a correct statement. Every foreign ship has had the benefit of the coastwise trade law.

Mr. KAHN. That was only during the war.

Mr. SCOTT. And 120 days after, which will not expire until 120 days after the declaration of peace.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. In reply to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], permit me to say that the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. did operate in the Pacific five large vessels, all flying the American flag, which were entitled to engage in the coastwise trade and did so engage prior to the suspension brought about by the war legislation referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the United States has commandeered and still retains the passenger ships formerly serving the Hawaiian Islands, we ask that Hawaii be exempted from the repeal of the coastwise suspension law, in so far as passenger traffic is concerned, as provided in this bill, until July 1, 1920. I desire to make it clear to the Members of this House that Hawaii is a thorough and consistent believer in the protection policy and principle. Therefore this bill further provides that after July 1, 1920, a charge be made of $40 per ticket, which will be in the nature of a protective tariff against travel on all foreign ships in favor of American ships, this to continue until the President of the United States is satisfied that sufficient American steamers have been provided to accommodate the passenger trade between the Territory of Hawaii and the mainland of the United States.

In recent years, and during the course of the war, five of the largest steamers formerly serving the passenger traffic between Hawaii and the Pacific coast, belonging to the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., have been transferred, two to the Atlantic trade and three to foreign registry. I am convinced that sufficient American tonnage can not be provided to take care of the normal and increasing volume of passenger travel between Hawaii and the mainland for several years to come. Hawaii therefore asks that permits be issued for travel on boats of foreign registry upon the payment of a fee of $40 to secure to us the physical possibilities of travel when urgent business or personal reasons demand it.

Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Members of the House, let me call attention to the status of the passenger-carrying capacity to and from Hawaii of the then American ships serving that traffic before the war and the conditions that exist to-day. Before the war the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. was operating under the American flag the Manchuria, the Mongolia, the Korea, the Siberia, and the China. While these were through boats, still there was available limited accommodations to and from Hawaii. Two of the largest of these boats—the Manchuria and the Mongolia—will no longer be available in giving service to the Hawaiian Islands, as they are permanently in the Atlantic trade. The accommodations which may be available on the three boats left, now under foreign flag, will be denied us if Congress fails to exempt Hawaii in the repeal of this coastwise suspension law.

The Maui, the Matsonia, the Wilhelmina, of the Matson Co., the Sierra, of the Oceanic Co., and the Great Northern, our fastest and greatest prewar passenger carrier, with a combined passenger capacity of 1,450, all under the American flag, and our main travel lines between the coast and the island Territory are now under Government control in the Atlantic transport service.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, we people of Hawaii are to-day left with four small steamers, flying the American flag, with only a total passenger capacity of 231. We are virtually marooned. The relief given us by the suspension of the coastwise shipping law during the war made it possible for us to travel on vessels operating under foreign flags. Passenger accommodations were so limited, due to these vessels catering to the through trade, that Hawaii has had little benefit from the privilege. In 1918, with 10 vessels plying under foreign flags, made average total weekly carrying from San Francisco to Hawaii of only 46 passengers and from Hawaii to San Francisco of only 36 passengers.

Reliable advices from the best informed shipping men in San Francisco are to the effect that 700 persons have been unable to secure bookings in the past six months. These 700 desired to go to Hawaii for important business or personal reasons. Their number does not include some 3,000 or more who, making inquiry for transportation, were informed that if they were successful in securing transportation to Hawaii they could not expect to return during this year, as there would not be available passenger accommodations. The four steamers of the Matson Co., flying the American flag, are booked to capacity until next winter.

WHAT ABOUT SHIPS?

Unless Hawaii wakes up and takes immediate steps to provide for shipping facilities, we are going to be virtually marooned here on our islands with almost negligible steamship connection with the mainland and the Orient.

The report that the Toyo Kisen Kaisha plans to take not only the Siberia, as heretofore announced, but also the Tenyo, Shinyo, and Korea off the Honolulu run, leaving of the Japanese boats only the almost obsolete Nippon and Persia, need occasion little surprise, but it gives cause for real apprehension.

Of course, the T. K. K. feels under no obligation to Hawaii. The company evidently thinks that it can make more money by cutting out Honolulu and running its principal vessels directly between San Francisco and the Orient. If it can, it assuredly is not going out of its way to oblige Hawaii.

That throws us upon our own resources, and it must be admitted that at present they are not great. True, we hope to have all the Matson steamers back before many months, but they are not enough to take care of the volume of freight and passenger trade, which, it should be remembered, appears liable greatly to increase before long.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I am advised that the three Matson boats will be ready to be returned by the 1st of September at the very latest.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. We have been asking for relief, and were told that we would get them back in July, and later extended to August, and now I understand that we will not get them until January.

Mr. KAHN. The boats will be turned over to the Matson Line this month.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. We were told that the Matsonia and the Maui, being the cheapest transports to operate in the Atlantic Ocean, will be the last boats to be returned; when that will be is a matter of conjecture.

Mr. KAHN. I can assure the gentleman that I was informed by the chief of transportation that they will be returned this month.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I hope so; but it will take some time to reconstruct and refit them before they can be put into actual running. I will now continue the reading of the newspaper article:

What are we going to do for ships?

That is a question that can no longer be ignored. We can't go on leaving everything to chance. There are no increased shipping facilities in sight, except the Matson boats, which, as stated above, are insufficient to care for our business.

Hawaii simply must have more steamers. If we don't take steps pretty soon to get them we might as well give up our dreams of becoming an important trade and shipping center and lapse back into a dreamy island refuge for such occasional tourists as can manage to get here.

Let me call your attention to a statement made by Director Mather, of the National Park Service, who had a most strenuous time in his recent journey to Hawaii and return. None of the American steamship companies could assure him of an early return, so after overstaying his leave he finally succeeded in purchasing the quarters of a Japanese officer on the Korea Maru for the sum of $150 over and above the regular fare. My own recent experience in trying to leave Honolulu to come here for this session is also illustrative of our situation. Anticipating an extra session, I began to apply for bookings in April. There was no space available. Eventually, on June 9, the captain of the Lurline brought me across. My bunk was the lounge in the chart room. A concession for which I was truly grateful.

The business and professional men and Government officials have not only suffered by this woeful lack of transportation, but the women marooned in Hawaii and Hawaiian women marooned on the mainland have had a more trying situation. Let me impress you with the fact that within the last six months several women have been found on boats leaving Honolulu as stowaways. One young lady, now in San Francisco, arrived on July 16. She left her mother in Honolulu and stowed away on one of the Matson Co. steamers in order that she might meet and marry her soldier boy arriving from France and marooned on the mainland. The other lady, after trying various ways to reach San Francisco and join her family, not being able to secure legitimate passage, took a chance as a stowaway, paying the captain for her passage after they found her at sea.

During this month I received a cable urging that I ask the Shipping Board to permit two ladies who have been marooned in Honolulu to sail by the S. S. Chipchung to New York, either as passengers or as members of the crew. The Chipchung is a freight boat loading sugar at Honolulu for New York. She has no passenger license. So that if the ladies were granted the permission they had to sign on as members of the crew of a freighter. This only further shows our travel conditions:

TWO WOMEN TRY TO STOW AWAY ON "SACHEM."

Desperate because they could not obtain passage on any steamer bound for San Francisco, two women attempted recently to stow away on a Matson boat bound for the coast.

They had been unable to secure accommodations on account of the great passenger congestion which has prevailed for the last several months, so, determined to get away, they hid on board the steamer. They were found and put ashore before the boat sailed.

Now, let me make this clear to the Members of the House. We in Hawaii have never had ample travel facilities. Remember, the Pacific every day comes more to the fore in our national affairs. Hawaii must be made easy of access from the mainland. With the granting to us of the two exceptions in this repeal of the coastwise suspension law our needs will not then be met. Hawaii is to have a permanent Army garrison of some 30,000 soldiers; our naval base at Pearl Harbor will grow in national importance year by year. This means an influx of people to Hawaii. The prewar conditions will not measure up to our needs when we are again on a peace basis. We must be given this opportunity to provide travel facilities now. This can be done in two ways. Exempt Hawaii until July 1, 1920, from the repeal of this suspension. I truly trust that by that time our best boats, now bringing soldiers from France, will be rebuilt and restored to Hawaii. With their return the insufficiency in travel accommodations will not even then be met. And it will not be met by allowing us after that date to take advantage of travel in vessels of foreign registry on the payment of a customs duty of $40 per passenger per trip. We ask this to relieve a congestion that is bound to exist and to make it possible to voyage from Hawaii to the mainland in case of necessity. Remember that we do not ask this last provision be made operative for Hawaii without end. A limit is placed upon it, and that limit is to be determined by the President of the United States when he feels convinced that adequate shipping flying the American flag is operating between Hawaii and the mainland, and that we Hawaiian people have equal advantages of travel with the people of the various States.

Mr. Speaker, many of the Members of Congress, I am pleased to state, have been to Hawaii and are familiar to a degree with our conditions. These Members know that what I now ask is not unreasonable, but just and equitable. They know the value of Hawaii to the United States, and they know that Hawaii never asks for favors from the Federal Government through the National Congress unless the request is based on right and justice.

Let there be no mistake or misunderstanding on this subject. Hawaii is not asking this privilege of travel in order to secure lower rates. Certainly we are not asking it for the benefit of foreign ships. Neither are we asking it as a matter of choice or preference. We ask it only as a matter of necessity, in order to secure the physical possibility of travel and reasonable freedom and facility for going to and coming from the mainland of the United States.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if the House feels that the war-time suspension of the coastwise law should be repealed now, then I ask that Hawaii be exempted as provided for in the bill.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in order that you may have a comprehensive understanding of the chronology of the legislation affecting the bill directly pending before us, it might be well to advert a moment to the original status of this legislation, because, as you have found out from the arguments this morning, one of the great propositions that will come up for consideration in this Congress is from the Merchant Marine Committee, namely, the disposition and operation of our shipping facilities. As you have no doubt learned from the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, Judge HARDY, who represents that school of thought favoring the repeal of our coastwise law, a large part of the controversy will be as to what shall be the permanent policy of the Government of the United States with reference to the coastwise trade.

The particular bill which we are considering was primarily originated for the relief of the inadequate passenger service between Hawaii and the mainland of the United States, but after the committee had given some consideration to that primary proposition, it developed on the recommendation of the Shipping Board that, in their judgment, the time had now arrived when we could safely repeal the provisions of the emergency act which we passed and which was approved on October 6, 1917. So that a repeal of that emergency act approved on that day was incorporated and is now section 1 of the pending bill.

What was the status of this legislation affecting the coastwise trade at the time that the United States went into the war? It was based on an amendment to the original Panama Canal act, and was approved on August 24, 1914. That act, which covered the situation at the time of our entering into the war, provided that no foreign-built vessels registered pursuant to the act should engage in the coastwise trade of the United States. So that at the time we went into the war the coastwise trade was only open to American-built or American-owned vessels under the American flag; and, as has been suggested, in order that we might meet the emergency in our overseas trade and the great demand for tonnage, it was thought advisable temporarily to suspend the provisions of that law. Therefore we passed the act of October 6, 1917.

The first section of the pending bill is to repeal the emergency act of October 6, 1917, so that we shall revert to the original status affecting the coastwise trade as provided in the permanent law of 1914.

I must frankly confess that I have not as yet formed any fixed opinion as to the wisdom or unwisdom of in anywise changing the existing policy with reference to the coastwise trade, and I want to suggest particularly to the new Members of this Congress that they should endeavor to secure the extensive hearings that are now being and have been conducted by the Merchant Marine Committee, and that will be conducted hereafter, in order that they might form an intelligent and sound judgment one way or the other upon that great proposition. I must confess that I was very deeply impressed by some of the arguments made by my distinguished friend from Texas, Judge HARDY, and it is a problem that is going to require the conservative thought and solution of this Congress.

The statement has been made here that this merchant marine question is one of the biggest questions before the country. I know of none of more paramount importance. There is not a district in the United States that is the producer of any raw material or any manufactured article that is not vitally interested in this question of transportation. Primarily, those who are interested in foreign markets are interested in railroad transportation; and if they are seeking the development of foreign markets for their goods, the proposition of overseas carrying vessels for that trade is most important. I know that in our section of the country, where we are producers of such a large amount of raw material and manufactured products, we are deeply interested in it.

The situation is this: When the Shipping Board has completed its present program they will have available for disposition approximately 14,000,000 tons of shipping. That has largely been built out of the Treasury of the United States. We have appropriated staggering sums of money, and we acted wisely in doing that. We will be confronted with the situation of having a great merchant marine; and then the problem is, how are we going to wisely and safely and economically operate it in order to develop our foreign trade in competition with our foreign neighbors? So that you will see that this question that has been opened up here this morning, although not directly pertinent to the bill pending before the House, is fraught with grave and extreme importance with reference to the future and with reference to drawing proper deductions from the state of facts now existing. The problem that we are going to confront first is the question of the cost of production of American-built ships. Mr. Hurley stated before the committee a few days ago that in his opinion we have now reached a situation where we can build ships approximately as cheaply as foreign countries. That is going to be of primary consideration. If we can not do that, we are handicapped at the very beginning of our overseas trade. I believe that with American ingenuity, American genius for organization and efficiency, this can be done.

Aside from that vital question of cost of construction, the next element will necessarily be the cost of operation. Under the provisions of the American seamen's act now existing, and which I am not in favor of repealing, because I believe in preserving the high standard of wages and living conditions for American seaman, the next element is the question, Can we, under the provisions of that act, compete with the labor employed on foreign vessels in this overseas trade? If we can not meet those two elements of competition, then, in order to compete and carry on and operate our great merchant marine, we will have to devise some measure of meeting that deficiency. We must look the question squarely in the face. If an investigation of those two preliminary propositions develops without controversy that we can not meet the character of that opposition, then some plan, either of subvention, or subsidy, or something of that kind, must be devised, otherwise we can not operate them. I am expressing no opinion upon that proposition. I am inherently opposed, as is nearly everyone in this House, to the principle of Government subsidy; that is, the payment out of the Treasury of the United States to one class of business enterprise of the money which is taxed out of the pockets of all the people of the United States. We may just as well realize now as hereafter, because we are coming to it, that we have to meet the issue that that is the situation with which we are going to be confronted. I prefer to be optimistic in respect to the situation. I believe that this great reawakened American people, with the genius of its citizenship, will be able to meet this problem on terms of equality in competition with the whole world. I believe that this Republic of ours, which sent abroad 2,000,000 glittering bayonets, carried by 2,000,000 brave and stalwart sons, can by the same character of aggressive competition carry the flag of the American merchant marine, manned by American sailors, in competition to every part of the seven seas. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I withhold it for the present.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, within 10 minutes I shall not undertake to travel the path that has been traveled by other gentlemen as regards this legislation. An experience of many years as a lawyer before a jury has taught me that we ought to understand what the issue is in order to decide the question involved. This is a bill to extend additional passenger facilities to the people of Hawaii. The Hawaiian Islands are under the American flag. Their citizens are American citizens. Those islands are the paradise of the Pacific. They are among our greatest possessions, and the wishes of the people of those islands should have some sort of consideration by this Congress rather than the interests of some steamship company. [Applause.] The gentleman from California speaks for the Matson Steamship Co. I speak for the American citizens, also under the American flag, marooned in the Pacific Ocean. Now, the first section of this bill (H. R. 7500) simply repeals the act of October 6, 1917. The provisions of that act are as follows:

An act giving the United States Shipping Board power to suspend present provisions of law and permit vessels of foreign registry and foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under the act of August 18, 1914, to engage in the coastwise trade during the present war and for a period of 120 days thereafter, except the coastwise trade with Alaska.

Be it enacted, etc., That during the present war with Germany and for a period of 120 days thereafter the United States Shipping Board may, if in its judgment the interests of the United States require, suspend the present provisions of law and permit vessels of foreign registry, and foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under the act of August 18, 1914, to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States: Provided, That no such vessel shall engage in the coastwise trade except upon a permit issued by the United States Shipping Board, which permit shall limit or define the scope of the trade and the time of such employment: Provided further, That in issuing permits the board shall give preference to vessels of foreign registry owned, leased, or chartered by citizens of the United States or corporations thereof: And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the coastwise trade with Alaska or between Alaskan ports.

Approved, October 6, 1917.

You will note that under the provisions of that act that vessels of foreign registry and foreign-built vessels admitted to register under the American flag under the act of August 18, 1914, can engage in our coastwise trade under certain limitations. It is a matter of no concern to me whether that act is repealed or not at this time, because it expires by limitation of law in 120 days after the ratification of the peace treaty. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] has stated that the Shipping Board has already canceled all permits granted under that so that in effect that law is already repealed. So that disposes of that question. The repeal of the act of October 6, 1917, is of no other concern under the circumstances, as it is no longer in operation.

My esteemed friend, for I regard him as such as well as one of the finest characters in this House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], has always been in favor of free ships. He has always opposed the limitation that no other than American ships should be admitted to the coastwise laws. I am frank to say that if we had adopted that policy following the Civil War and for a definite period of years, it would have done much to uphold our merchant marine in the foreign trade, but we did not build any ships for 40 years of any consequence for the foreign trade.

So that I am in accord with much Judge HARDY says, if applied to prewar conditions. In 1912, when the Senate was Republican and the House Democratic and William H. Taft was President of the United States, I caused to have incorporated in section 5 of the Panama Canal Act the provision permitting foreign-built ships to be brought in under the American flag to engage in the foreign trade. And after the war in Europe began in August, 1914, I introduced the bill to repeal so much of section 5 of the Panama Canal Act as provides that vessels not more than five years old might be admitted to registry under the act. The bill passed the House under suspension of the rules and was unopposed in the Senate. It was an emergency measure, and under the provisions of the act foreign-built ships American owned have been admitted to American registry. Under its provisions more than 1,000,000 tons of vessels have come under the American flag. But those were ships for the most part built for and employed in the foreign trade. Some were vessels owned by the United States Steel Corporation, others by the Standard Oil Co., and a large number by the United Fruit Co. They are not engaged in the trade between the Hawaiian Islands and the mainland, and they would not meet the present emergency to serve the trade at this time. Now, section 2 of this bill simply provides:

SEC. 2. That vessels of foreign registry and foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under the act entitled "An act to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes," approved August 18, 1914, may carry passengers from or to ports in the Territory of Hawaii to or from ports in the United States, except ports in Alaska, upon special permits issued by the collector of customs for the district in which is situated the port of embarkation. After July 1, 1920, such permits shall be granted only upon payment to the collector of a fee of $40 for each passenger so carried. Such fees shall be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce shall jointly make regulations necessary for the issuance of such permits.

Whenever the President is satisfied that vessels of the United States, other than those admitted to American registry under such act of August 18, 1914, are engaged in trade between such ports in sufficient numbers to accommodate the passenger trade between such ports he shall so declare by proclamation, and thereafter this section shall cease to be in effect.

This bill extends to the people of the Hawaiian Islands very meager relief. I seriously question whether they will, even if this bill becomes a law, have sufficient passenger accommodations. In order to have such accommodations they must have a very large increase in the number of ships plying between the Pacific coast and the Hawaiian Islands. Unless they can utilize the passenger accommodations on foreign ships their needs will not be met in any reasonable measure. We are just beginning to develop the trans-Pacific trade, and it will take time to do so, and for that reason I can not imagine any good reason why this condition should not be relieved temporarily in the very reasonable and conservative manner proposed by this bill.

Now, Mr. Dillingham, president of the Chamber of Commerce of Honolulu, made this statement before the committee:

The situation that is presented to Hawaii at this time is that under the suspension of the coastwise act, within 120 days after the signing of peace, the privilege to travel on boats of foreign registry is denied to travelers between San Francisco and Hawaii. We have lost practically all of our passenger boats since the entry of the United States into the war, as our best boats were taken to the Atlantic and used in the transport of troops overseas.

That is true, and while these ships may come back in the next month or two months or three months they have to be overhauled before being available for that trade, and no three ships will be sufficient for the trade. And, mind you, the provisions of this bill do not extend to the freight business, but to the passenger business alone. In further answer to questions propounded to him by me he said:

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The suspension of the coastwise shipping law during the war has made it possible for us to travel on any of these boats when there was accommodation. Accommodations, however, have been so limited, due to the business in the Far East, that Hawaii has had little benefit from the privilege. The average in 1918 was 46 a week one way and 36 a week the other way. In other words, that is the relief we had out of the Toyo Kisben Kaisha Line, and this line operates the Korea and Siberia, American steamers which were bought by the Pacific mail in 1916.

* * * * * * *

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was coming to that, but I wanted to give you a picture, first, of what the situation has been during the past two years. Hawaii has been very glad to contribute everything we had and to put up with all kinds of inconvenience and loss as our contribution to winning the war. Now we are trying to get back to a peace basis, as are the other sections of the United States. We do not mean to be unreasonable, but only partial relief will come through turning back our boats now in the transport service. Within the next year, the Maui, a 10,000-ton boat, the Matsonia, a 10,000-ton boat, the Wilhelmina, a 7,000-ton boat, and the Sierra, of the Oceanic Steamship Line, a 6,000-ton boat, will be returned to us. With these boats back on the run we will, of course, be in very much better shape than we are to-day; but if the business with the Far East continues we will not be able to use the through foreign boats any more than we have been able to use them during the war.

The growing business of Hawaii can not be taken care of by the whole Matson fleet. While these will be a tremendous help to us, they will not be sufficient to take care of all the business, and it will take, we feel, a year or two for American shipping to reach the point where other American boats can be put on the run between San Francisco and Hawaii. What we are asking is that instead of closing the door absolutely to travel on these boats, that the right to use boats of foreign registry be extended to Hawaii until such time as American boats sufficient to handle our business are available.

* * * * * * *

Instead of having accommodations for 300 a week on an average, we have been reduced to an average capacity of about 50 a week. The tourist business of the islands has been steadily increasing until, in 1916, there were 12,000 passenger fares sold between Honolulu and San Francisco. In 1917 it was cut down to 10,000; in 1918 to about 4,500, and for the first half of this year there have only been 1,700 passengers between those two points. The tourist business of necessity, of course, has been entirely cut out. We have been depending on foreign boats for some relief, but when I tell you that in June of this year a boat came through Honolulu and only 10 of the 250 people awaiting passage from Honolulu to San Francisco could secure passage you will appreciate that even with the privilege of traveling on foreign boats we are up against a serious situation. The proposition of cutting off all travel on these through foreign boats within the next 120 days, if no action is taken as now suggested by bill 7500, means that we are going to be practically marooned in the Pacific. We will be thrown back on the five small local boats now operating.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Can the gentleman give me five minutes more?

Mr. SCOTT. I have only five or six minutes remaining.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to say, gentlemen, this bill should pass in the form in which it was reported by the committee, and even then it will only give partial relief to the citizens of the Hawaiian Islands. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. I would ask the gentleman from Texas to use the balance of his time as there is only to be one other speech on this side.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I shall at the proper time offer an amendment to this bill striking out all after the enacting clause, and when read and understood it simply means to retain the——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that all amendments have to be offered during the time of debate.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then I offer it now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY of Texas: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act giving the United States Shipping Board power to suspend present provisions of law and permit vessels of foreign registry and foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under the act of August 18, 1914, to engage in the coastwise trade during the present war and for a period of 120 days thereafter, except the coastwise trade with Alaska,' approved October 6, 1917, is repealed in so far as said act permits vessels of foreign registry to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, and all provisions in said act limiting the period of its operation are repealed.

"SEC. 2. That vessels of foreign registry may carry passengers from or to ports in the Territory of Hawaii to or from ports in the United States upon special permits issued by the collector of customs for the district in which is situated the port of embarkation. Such permits shall be granted only upon payment to the collector of a fee of $40 for each passenger so carried. Such fees shall be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce shall jointly make regulations necessary for the issuance of such permits."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as was very aptly said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], there is really only one proposition before the House at the present time, and I wish at this time to pay my respects to the ability of the gentleman from Alabama, who is a valuable member of our committee. The only proposition that is before this House is to repeal the war-time coastwise trade law, which allowed all foreign ships to come in to our coastwise trade and take the benefit of 100 years of American activities in building up that trade. No man on the Democratic side ought to object to the exception of the Hawaiian Islands, because the bill allows the President of the United States to terminate the law when in his judgment there is sufficient American tonnage to accommodate the people of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to know the reason why a tax of $40 per passenger should be imposed.

Mr. SCOTT. It is a protection to our American-owned ships against foreign ships, with their cheap labor.

Mr. BLACK. I wish to say I am not in favor of a tax of that sort.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I may suggest that it is $200 now.

Mr. SCOTT. I endeavored to explain that this bill reduces the penalty 75 per cent.

Now, my good friend from Texas [Mr. HARDY] insists that he wants to get all the ships possible to come under the American flag.

No man in this House, on either side of the aisle, is opposed to that propositon. It is not a question of politics. It is a question of policy in which we are all united. But as was aptly said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], this bill relates only to the coastwise trade. It does not relate to the transoceanic trade. The two are as different as daylight and darkness. The fact that we had only 8 per cent of the trans-Atlantic trade prior to the war is not any reflection on the policy which made possible our enormous coastwise trade, because before the war we had a coastwise trade greater than the combined trade of any five other countries.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Just in a moment. Let me call the attention of the House to this fact: Although the United States is a comparatively young Nation, yet as soon as we in 1789 inaugurated a protective policy, in so far as our coastwise trade was concerned, every other nation engaged in coastwise trade has followed our example, and to-day and before the war England, Norway, Germany, France, Italy, and every other nation has protected its coastwise trade, the same as we protect ours and have protected ours for the last one hundred and thirty-odd years. We are not retrogressing. We set the precedent and they all followed it.

Now, the gentlemen, in speaking to the other side of the House, said that the policy of the administration is to encourage ships to come under the American flag, and he quoted Mr. Hurley on the proposition. Before presenting this bill we realized that the Government was vitally interested in any bill that was presented touching this subject.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. The committee wrote Mr. Hurley, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, and sent him a copy of this bill, and asked him to give us the opinion of the board touching the proposed legislation. Here is his reply:

We see no objection to the withdrawing of the coastwise trade privilege. The only exception we submit to your committee is in the instance of Honolulu and the Hawaiian Islands.

We have entirely complied with the suggestion of the Shipping Board which is charged with this particular subject. In so far as the Hawaiian Islands are concerned, we have endeavored to relieve their situation in accordance with the suggestion of Mr. KALANIANAOLE, the Delegate from the Hawaiian Islands, who has in a most capable manner presented a case which entitles his countrymen and visitors to the islands to every relief the Congress can give.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute left.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield that minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 2, strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That the said repeal shall not take effect as to the Territory of Hawaii until July 1, 1920."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the bill now being read for amendment?

The SPEAKER. No. The bill has already been read for amendment. The rule provides that amendments can only be offered during the time allowed for general debate. The time has expired and, according to the rule, the first amendments in order are the committee amendments. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 5, insert a comma after the word "registry."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "Such" at the end of the line and insert "after July 1, 1920, such."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to a typographical error in line 2 of page 2. The printer has placed a comma after the word "registry," and the comma should be placed after the word "registry" in line 1. I ask that the correction be made.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think I may want to alter my amendment. I would like to ask unanimous consent to strike out section 2 of the amendment that I offered, so that it will contain only section 1.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out section 2. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY of Texas: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act giving the United States Shipping Board power to suspend present provisions of law and permit vessels of foreign registry and foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under the act of August 18, 1914, to engage in the coastwise trade during the present war and for a period of 120 days thereafter, except the coastwise trade with Alaska,' approved October 6, 1917, is repealed in so far as said act permits vessels of foreign registry to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, and all provisions in said act limiting the period of its operation are repealed."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserved a point of order on that amendment. I do not think there is any question but that the point of order would be sustained in connection with it, but I realize that the House should vote on the matter if it wanted to, and therefore I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 2, strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That said repeal shall not take effect as to the Territory of Hawaii until July 1, 1920."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I understood the amendment to provide only for the passenger trade.

Mr. KAHN. No; it is just as I have offered it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will offer it.

Mr. KAHN. I move to recommit the bill with instructions to report the same back forthwith, with the amendment which I offered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KAHN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Page 2, strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That said repeal shall not take effect as to the Territory of Hawaii until July 1, 1920."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the motion to recommit, that, in view of the fact that the House considered and passed upon this precise amendment, the same subject matter can not be contained in a motion to recommit, the House having passed on the amendment adversely.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, Speaker CLARK held repeatedly, and it became the rule of the House, that where an amendment had been agreed to by the House it was not then in order to offer a motion to recommit striking out that amendment. That had not been the rule of the House prior to the occupancy of the Speaker's chair by the very distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. But I do not recollect that he ever went so far—I am quite sure my recollection is correct upon the subject—as to hold that where the House had rejected an amendment it could not be included in a motion to recommit. It does not come within the reasoning which Speaker CLARK used—a line of reasoning which I always doubted—that the House having just agreed to an amendment, it was not in order to offer a motion to recommit to strike out the amendment. Of course, it is perfectly patent that the rejection of an amendment by the Committee of the Whole would not prevent the offering of a motion to recommit. I see that the Chair is prepared to rule.

The SPEAKER. A citation has been put before the Chair in accordance with the argument just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. KAHN) there were—ayes 6, noes 88.

Accordingly the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THOMAS J. MOONEY.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Labor from further consideration of House resolution No. 185, and upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order, and make the point of order that the gentleman's motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. This is a privileged resolution.

Mr. MANN. The resolution has not been reported.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that the resolution be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 185.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to report forthwith to the House of Representatives of the United States of America the following facts:

(1) What fact or facts, if any there are, have caused him to fail to comply with the request of the House of Representatives made upon him by H. Res. 128 passed by the House of Representatives on June 27, 1919, of the following tenor:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, requested to promptly report to the House of Representatives at the earliest date practicable the following facts:

"(1) What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any, has John B. Densmore, now Director of the United States Employment Service, had with the case of Thomas J. Mooney, convicted in California of crime, stating in detail the activities of said Densmore concerning said case, and the expenses of same itemized that were paid by the Government, and upon what authority of law, attaching copies of all reports concerning same made to the Department of Labor by said John B. Densmore.

"(2) What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any, since the punishment of said Thomas J. Mooney was commuted to life imprisonment, has any employee of said Department of Labor had with the said case of Thomas J. Mooney, stating such activities in detail, the purposes thereof, the expense itemized in connection therewith that has been paid or is to be paid by the Government, and upon what authority of law, attaching copies of all reports made to the Department of Labor concerning said case.

"(3) What requests on the Department of Labor, if any, have been made by a grand jury or a court in California for said John B. Densmore to appear in California to give evidence, and what action concerning same was taken by the Department of Labor."

(2) Resolved further, That said Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish forthwith to the House of Representatives the facts called for in the said H. Res. 128, set forth above, as passed June 27, 1919.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Texas on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will state his point of order.

Mr. GARRETT. It calls for reasons, not for facts. I have not the resolution before me, but in the first part of it he is asked for facts that have caused certain actions.

Mr. MANN. It is purely a matter of opinion.

Mr. GARRETT. Why, certainly; it is necessarily a matter of opinion.

Mr. MANN. While it nominally purports to call for facts, it asks for facts which caused certain opinions to be formed.

Mr. BLANTON. I should like to be heard on the point of order before the Chair rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on June 27 this House passed House resolution 128, which called upon the Secretary of Labor to furnish to this House at the earliest date practicable certain information specified therein. There are various things which could have intervened that might have prevented the Secretary of Labor from complying with the request of the House. For instance, the data called for might have been misplaced in his office, so that it could not be found. The person in charge of the data might have been sick, so that he could not have prepared it. Various facts might have intervened which would have necessarily prevented the Secretary of Labor from complying with the request of the House. The fact remains that at the time the resolution now under consideration, House resolution 185, was introduced in the House the Secretary of Labor had not complied with any portion of the request contained in resolution No. 128.

This resolution, House resolution 185, does not call for any opinion. It calls for nothing but a fact. It is a fact whether or not the Secretary of Labor has complied with the request. It is a fact whether or not the Secretary of Labor can comply with the request. Whether he will comply with it might depend upon an opinion, but whether he has been prevented from complying with the request of the House is dependent absolutely upon some fact which may or may not exist in that department. It might be a fact of negligence; it might be a fact of simple refusal; it might be a fact of some particular action of some person in his department. I submit to the Chair that there is nothing called for in the resolution except facts, and no opinion is asked of the Secretary of Labor.

In response to the resolution he could not state opinions, only state what is called for, and those are facts. The resolution has laid over for a week, has been unreported by the Committee on Labor, and therefore, under Rule XXIII, becomes privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear from the gentleman from Tennessee or the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to add. I now have the resolution before me. The first paragraph says what fact or facts, if any there are, have caused him to fail to comply with the request of the House of Representatives made upon him by House resolution, and so forth.

I think unquestionably that calls for an opinion from the Secretary of Labor. It is in fact asking him to give his reasons for not complying.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the gentleman from Tennessee. While nominally the resolution calls for facts, it does not call for facts outlined by the resolution. It is a fishing excursion. and it has always been held that these privileged resolutions were not fishing excursions. This calls for the opinion of the Secretary of Labor as to why he did not do something under the guise of facts which caused him to do so and so.

Facts may not be information. Facts may be information purely, but under that the Secretary would have the power to give all sorts of opinions. That is what they ask for. It never was the design of the rule to give the privilege to anything except that which asked for information in the possession of the department, and the rulings have been frequent and consistent against enlarging the privilege by calling for opinions. It is a matter of opinion, if they have not done something, why they have not done it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the language in line 11, page 2, where the department is asked to "state such activities in detail and the purposes thereof." It seems to me that "purposes thereof" is clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, that is a portion of the original resolution already passed by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in some doubt about this question. It is obviously an ingeniously worded attempt to inquire of the Secretary of Labor why he has not complied with the request of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, may I direct the Speaker's attention to the language, which says "if any there be," which clearly would give the Secretary of Labor an opportunity to express opinions as to whether there were facts or not. The resolution calls for facts if any there be. That leaves the Secretary of Labor to say whether there are facts or not, clearly expressing an opinion on the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a close question whether by verbally asking for only facts one does comply with the rule of the House, which says that the House can always ask for facts and nothing but facts. The Chair is disposed to think that, while in language a strict compliance with the rule, it really does ask for the reasons and opinion of the Secretary of Labor, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of price-fixing commission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed in relation to the laws of coastwise shipping.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AVIATION INVENTORY.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of House resolution 190, a privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 190.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to send forthwith to the House of Representatives, for the information of the House, a commercial inventory showing:

1. Number and type of aviation motors, with the number of each motor, where it is located, its condition, hours of use, and purchase price or cost of manufacture.

2. The number and type of planes, number of each plane, its location, hours of use, condition, and purchase price or cost of manufacture.

3. The number of spare parts for motor and plane of the respective types of motors and planes, where located, and cost.

4. Quantity and description of raw material, such as lumber, including spruce, ash, soft and hard woods; metals, such as steel, copper, aluminum, iron, brass, etc.; cloth, such as linen, silk, tape, cotton, and all raw material now the property or in the possession of the Air Service, and a statement showing the quantity of said motors, planes, and material now surplus and for sale.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was presented to the Committee on Military Affairs and reported with the recommendation that it pass. The purpose of my resolution, among other things, is to try to help the Air Service help itself.

In order to ascertain just what the Air Service has on hand and how much of its supplies and matériels are surplus, it is necessary to have a commercial inventory giving the information set forth in the resolution. The vital importance of having complete adequate information of Air Service matériel at this time is being emphasized every day. Recent sales in the Air Service would indicate that large amounts of equipment and matériel were sold without exact information of the condition of such matériel and equipment at the time the sale was made.

The two great items to be considered are parts in production, and planes and motors and parts in operation. A part or plane or motor which is listed as in production should be clearly defined as to what stage of completion it has progressed. If in operation how much of serviceable life has been consumed. The value of an aviation motor can only be determined by the number of hours it has flown; therefore it is necessary to know not only how many motors are available and surplus, but the record and life of each motor. Such records are kept of each motor, and this information is available if a proper inventory is taken. It will then develop whether it will pay to sell such as raw material or scrap, or to spend additional money on it, and to finish or repair the same and sell it or turn it over to the operating side of the Air Service at full value.

The relationship between the matériel that is required for the operation of the Air Service and the matériel now on hand, should be clearly established, and until such is accomplished it will never be known what is surplus. The so-called surplus which has been declared by the operating section of the Air Service up to the present time has not shown that this relationship has been established.

The Air Service at this moment does not have a commercial inventory of its assets in the shape of planes, motors, parts, and machinery. It is vital that this be determined, thoroughly classified, locations noted, and full information obtained. When this is done any group of intelligent business men or Air Service officers could determine what should be held for training and active use in the Air Service and what would be surplus to be sold to reimburse the Treasury of the United States.

With this inventory on hand, the sales department, or such agency intrusted with the sales of this matériel and equipment, will be enabled to dispose of such matériel and equipment and obtain its reasonable market value. Responsibility for failure to obtain reasonable market value will then be easily fixed. Also with such inventory on hand it can for once be determined just what new equipment the Air Service should acquire during the present fiscal year.

They have something like $250,000,000 worth of property. I have said so much about the sale of the Curtiss motors and the Curtiss planes, $22,000,000 worth being sold for $2,000,000, that I need not repeat the history of that sale at this time.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In just a moment. The reason that sale was made was due to the fact that the Air Service apparently did not know the condition of those motors and planes at the time the sale was made. At least that is the charitable thing to say for the present. They, it appears, were under the impression that most of them were junk or used matériel. They must realize now that the matériel was in first-class condition, because 90 per cent of the planes are being flown from the fields and are far from junk. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. Suppose we should go to the expense of this, spend thousands of dollars to get this information, and it is brought here to the House. What will it be worth to the House and to the department after it is obtained?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If we get this inventory—and this seems to be the only method by which we can compel the Air Service to find out for themselves what they have—the department of sales will know how to fix prices for what is surplus. To give a concrete example: They sold the Curtiss planes and the OX–5 motors when they should have kept some of those motors and planes for training purposes. The only way that the value of a plane can be ascertained, or of an aviation motor, is by determining the number of hours that either has been used. An aviation motor has so many hours of life. If we know that we have a certain number of motors that have had a certain number of hours of use, we can immediately establish the value of the motors, if they are surplus, and dispose of them intelligently and to the best interest of the Government.

Mr. WINGO. Evidently the gentleman did not get the point I want to get at. It is a practical point, and not asked in the spirit of controversy. For the life of me I can not understand how the spending of this money to get this information—and it is technical in its nature—will be of value, how it will be worth anything to us, except to the committees. How will that give this information to those gentlemen down there who the gentleman says have not got it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the first place it will not cost thousands of dollars to obtain this information, because they have the personnel and the officers. If the Air Service is not able to tell us what they have, it surely is in a sad state of affairs. Each motor has its history with it, and all that is required is to check up what they have, and it will not cost anything. Second, they have no commercial inventory at this time. We do not know exactly how much spruce, how much ash, how many motors of one kind, how many motors of another kind, they have, so that they are selling supplies without knowing whether such supplies are surplus or not. The sales department, which I have criticized a great deal on the floor of this House, in this instance is not to blame. They can not get it, and I want to cooperate with the sales department in this, to help ascertain the true condition of declared surplus. When we get this inventory the sales department can use it and the Air Service itself may use it. If the department can not help itself, we can at least try to help it while we are getting information which will prove very valuable.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, or a subcommittee thereof, has been appointed expressly to go into this particular question, along with all other questions connected with aviation. Let me submit to the gentleman from New York—I am not a member of that subcommittee—in all good reason that he is about to require a duplication of work upon the part of the War Department. It seems to me that the gentleman should be willing to leave to the committee appointed for the purpose the question of investigating that and the development of these facts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In reply to the gentleman I will state that I have been cooperating and have constantly conferred with the chairman of the subcommittee on aviation, and the information asked by this resolution will be a valuable index for their work.

Mr. GARRETT. They surely can obtain the matter without this. From how many different angles are you going to approach this proposition? I thought that committee was appointed to find about this particular thing. You are now calling upon the War Department to furnish it independent of the committee. Is it a lack of confidence in your committee?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not at all, and the gentleman knows it. It is simply to obtain information in the most expeditious manner. I have had this resolution in for some time. I could hardly believe that the Air Service could not give me this information by simply writing for it. But that is the fact. Remember, we have a right to know what is on hand. The information is necessary, and it will be saving time.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. It seems to me that the gentleman surely does not desire to seriously press this resolution. Some time ago the committee was organized for the express purpose of obtaining the precise information for which the gentleman asks. That committee has been empowered to summon and swear witnesses. As a matter of fact that committee is proceeding, and that very subcommittee is sitting at this very hour. Is it possible that the gentleman and his side of the House have lost confidence in the committee they have appointed for this particular purpose?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows that is not the intention. It is simply to assist that committee and get this information before it. The resolution was pending. We are saving time by doing this.

Mr. GARRETT. In what way can this assist the committee? The committee has full power to send for these people and swear them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But there is not one man in the department, from the Secretary down, who is able to testify what the Air Service owns and has now after spending a billion dollars.

Mr. GARRETT. How are they going to give you the information?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. By taking an inventory—something that should have been done months ago. I can appreciate the gentleman's anxiety. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KELLEY of Michigan). The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 66, noes 40.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 156, nays 108, answered "present" 2, not voting 163, as follows:

Mr. MURPHY with Mr. JONES of Texas.

Mr. CLASSON with Mr. WEBB.

Mr. BRITTEN with Mr. WISE.

Mr. MUDD with Mr. KETTNER.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for five minutes on this proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to keep my friends on the Republican side from making a very serious mistake.

Along about the 1st of June a special committee was created to investigate expenditures in the War Department. That committee was subsequently divided into five subcommittees. One of those subcommittees was expressly charged with the duty of investigating every phase and character of the Aviation Service. That subcommittee has been authorized by the full committee under resolution of the House to employ a lawyer to review the report that was made upon this matter some time ago and the decision upon same of that former Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Hon. Charles Evans Hughes. It seems that, not content with appointing a committee with full power to investigate and to call before it these people and put them upon their oaths, not content to hire a lawyer to review the decision of a former Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and your party's nominee for President in 1916, you now propose to go still further, and pass another resolution calling upon the Secretary of War to give, but not under oath, the very thing that that subcommittee is charged with the duty of finding.

What sort of a reflection is that upon the committee that you have appointed? It certainly does seem to me that you ought to have confidence in that committee of your selection which is now at work day and night in the effort to obtain this evidence in the way that the House has instructed that it be obtained. And for that reason, Mr. Speaker, and in order to save these Republican gentlemen from making that tremendous mistake, I move to recommit this resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, and on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is true that there is a committee investigating the Air Service. It is true also that that committee discovered the very amazing fact that, having spent nearly $700,000,000 for airships, the War Department did not know how many they had or where they were. That committee so investigating might have asked for this information. It so happens that it is asked for by a member of another committee of the House, but the gentleman in charge of that committee will be delighted to secure this information in any way, and this is the way to secure it. Do the gentlemen on the other side object to having it secured or do they fear the War Department will not be able to furnish it? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] moves to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The House has just voted on the previous question. Is it not the proper thing to move the passage of the resolution before the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have only arrived at the stage where we have voted on the previous question. Therefore is not the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee rather premature? Is it not proper to first move the passage of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. This is a resolution, not a bill, and there is only one vote. The question is on the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 119.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit. Those in favor will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 145, answered "present" 2, not voting 177, as follows:

On motion of Mr. LAGUARDIA, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

IMPORTATION OF COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I present a report to accompany H. R. 8078, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill, with the accompanying report, will be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred H. R. 8078, "A bill to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and as incident thereto to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled 'An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes,'" having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment and recommend that the bill be passed.

This bill amends the present law in four important particulars. In its technical details it follows substantially the recommendations of the Tariff Commission in bringing the phraseology of the law up to date so as to prevent evasions of its provisions through undervaluation or false designation of articles sought to be imported. Experience in the administration of the existing law has made it clear that it is not so worded as to completely give effect to the intent of Congress, and it is believed that these technical changes will fulfill that purpose. In the second place it repeals that provision under which the specific duties shall be reduced at the rate of 20 per cent a year for five years. It increases the rates of duty from 15 per cent ad valorem and 2½ cents a pound on the intermediates to 40 per cent ad valorem and 6 cents a pound, and upon the finished product from 30 per cent ad valorem and 5 cents a pound to 45 per cent ad valorem and 7 cents a pound. Expert chemical opinion was unanimous that the rates of duty on the intermediates should be substantially the same as those upon the finished product. In the fourth place, the bill provides that for two years no foreign dyes can be imported except under a license granted by a board created in the bill.

The bill subdivides, as does the present law, the materials used in the dye industry into three classes, the crudes, the intermediates, and the finished product. The process of producing the crudes is comparatively simple, they being actually present in coal tar and only an isolation. Any country which, like this, has an abundant supply of cheap coal and a great steel industry requiring much coke has an unlimited supply of the raw material, and the rules therefore require no protection. But with regard to the intermediates the situation is entirely different. Their production requires the most elaborate chemical processes, which can be carried out without the waste of a large proportion of the raw materials used only by men of the most profound chemical knowledge and long experience, and such men are not yet available in sufficient numbers in this country. Under these circumstances therefore it is apparent that this industry requires for the present at least a very high degree of protection.

All this is still more true of the finished product, which may take one of six different forms. By further chemical processes, in some cases very simple, these intermediates may be converted into dyes, perfumes, pharmaceuticals, tanning materials, high explosives like T. N. T. and picric acid, or into poison gas. As a class these finished products, requiring, as they do, further labor and skill of a class plentiful in Germany, but still very scarce in this country, need a greater, though not much greater, measure of protection than do the so-called intermediates.

The remarkable interdependence of the dye and the explosive industry is well illustrated by the fact that once having obtained by a long series of elaborate chemical operations a certain intermediate, that intermediate may be converted by one very simple chemical change into sulphur black, one of the most widely used dyes, or into picric acid, one of the most important of high explosives. The technical knowledge and skill, the materials, and the apparatus necessary to make high explosives as well as poison gases and their antidotes are precisely what are to be found in any well-equipped dye works and nowhere else. A nation, therefore, which has a thoroughly complete dye industry capable of supplying its dye needs is always ready for a defensive or offensive war so far as the production of explosives and chemical gases are concerned. If, as seems likely, we are entering upon a period of international disarmament, the possession of such an industry becomes of infinite importance. In a world disarmed a nation possessing such a potential arsenal would be in a position to overwhelm any nation which had none and would be practically immune from attack.

An important, if not the most important, phase of this industry is its bearing upon the advancement of medical and industrial chemistry. It is the one industry which deals on a colossal scale with organic chemistry, and it is upon organic chemistry that the progress of modern medicine rests. Salvarsan, for instance, was developed in a dye-works laboratory, and is the first known certain cure for one of the most terrible scourges of humanity. It is confidently predicted that upon the further development of organic chemistry will rest the discovery of other cures for such devastating diseases as tuberculosis and even cancer.

This development rests upon the further development in this country of skilled research chemists, and it is only in a dye laboratory that large numbers of such chemists can find a livelihood. Accordingly a well-developed dye industry in this country will furnish a tremendous reservoir of technically trained men and of scientific knowledge upon which the most important industries of the country may draw in time of peace and the Nation itself in time of war or of threatened war.

The economic importance of the industrial side of this question is illustrated by the fact that industries in this country producing nearly $3,000,000,000 worth of goods each year are absolutely dependent upon coal-tar dyes, and industries producing as much more annually are indirectly dependent upon coal-tar dyes and kindred materials.

For many years before the war we had practically no dye industry in this country. Such dye works as we had were merely assembling plants for German materials and supplied only about one-tenth of the American market. Accordingly all the huge industries requiring dyestuffs were absolutely at the mercy of Germany and could have been dealt a crushing blow by Germany at any time the German trust saw fit. That Germany realized this is illustrated by a dispatch sent on March 13, 1915, by Count von Bernstorff to his own Government, as follows:

"Serial No. 432 of March 13, 1915. It is reported to me by Hossenfelder (telegram No. 4) that the stock of dyes in this country is so small that by a German embargo about 4,000,000 American workmen might be thrown out of employment."

As a matter of fact, Germany early in 1915, by the withdrawal of her supplies of dyes, attempted to force this Government into hostile action against Great Britain, and if she had had the power to send her own textiles into this country she would have inflicted a blow upon our textile industry from which probably it would have never recovered.

The war forced upon America the building up of the dye industry, for a situation arose under which many industries came to a practical standstill, and even the Government itself was in danger of having to cease to function in many important branches. For instance, the difficulty of securing printer's ink, which was entirely dependent upon dyes, brought about a situation under which the closing of the Government Printing Office seemed imminent and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was in most serious embarassment. The dyes necessary for even cheap and necessary clothing jumped in price, in some cases 5,000 per cent and in other cases were not procurable at all. Fortunately we had in this country an unlimited supply of the raw materials, and patriotic Americans in all branches of industry set to work to remedy the situation by making their own dyes.

Vast amounts of capital were risked without any assurance that it would not in the end be a total loss, as no one could guess how long the war would last, and as a result to-day we have in this country a dye industry which, although it is a mere baby, is able to supply the country's needs in most essentials, and will undoubtedly be able to supply the missing colors if given a reasonable time to get surely on its feet.

Under such conditions it would seem impossible that any loyal American would not realize the absolute necessity of saving and fostering such an industry as this. Only three methods of legislative assistance have been suggested—a tariff—a tariff supplemented by an antidumping provision and a tariff supplemented by a licensing system. Your committee believes that only the last of these methods would be effective, and has accordingly recommended its adoption.

The plan as provided in this bill is to form a licensing commission, its members to be designated by associations engaged in and representative of both the producing and consuming industries. This commission will have power to grant licenses for the importation of foreign dyes under certain conditions. It is positively commanded to grant licenses to any applicant to import any foreign dye which is not obtainable in this country from domestic sources, and any dye which, while made in this country, is not obtainable at a reasonable price, of good quality, and within a reasonable time. Thus absolute assurance is given any American consumer of dyes that he can at any time obtain the foreign product where the American industry is unable to supply on favorable terms. Conversely it will absolutely exclude transportation of dyes which are made in this country of satisfactory quality and at fair prices and insure the development and extension of the manufacture of those dyes. Furthermore, the applications for the importation of such dyes as are not made here will promptly stimulate our manufacturers to make the same dyes by showing that a strong demand exists for them and will thus guide the industry into the development which is really required.

During the life of this system a substantial number of dyes not made in this country will no doubt be imported, and as they will be subject to the rates of duty provided in this bill will produce a very substantial revenue for the Government.

Your committee does not suggest a license system as a permanent governmental policy, but feels that nothing else can meet the present emergency. Accordingly your committee recommends the license plan, together with an increased tariff, because as soon as the peace treaty is ratified the new American dye industry will be exposed to competition from an adversary so powerful and so desperate that no practical rate of duty can offer any real defense. The whole huge German dye industry, capable at the time of supplying the entire demand of the world, was combined in 1916 into a single immense trust, organized on purpose to fight its way back to the former German world monopoly. The combination is even now enormously prosperous. Starting with assets of nearly half a billion dollars, invested in the empire's most remunerative industry, plants of the trust have been busy throughout the war making all Germany's poison gases, many of her munitions, and at the same time enough dyes to accumulate a reserve capable of flooding the market of this or any other country. Recent observers report that the working forces have been held together complete and intact throughout the war and since its cessation, and that one at least of the component companies has made large additions to plants since the armistice.

The resources of the trust are therefore colossal. Its plants are so huge and organized for such vast production that unless it can regain most of its former world market half its equipment must lie idle and the other half run at low efficiency. It must then recover its world market or cease to exist as a profitable business. Even before the war, when its supremacy was uncontested, the German industry's competition was utterly unscrupulous. It practiced ruthlessly every form of corrupt and unfair competition known to commerce. What can be more certain, then, than that in the almost immediate future, when instead of a comfortable and safe supremacy it faces possible destruction, it will attack all competitors with reckless disregard of all considerations of business decency.

This attack, unless Congress acts very speedily, will be concentrated upon us. Great Britain, France, and Japan have protected their own Government-aided dye industries by license laws essentially similar to the one herein recommended. The market of the United States is therefore, except that of China, Germany's last opening. To penetrate it and destroy our domestic producers the trust will surely be glad to spend millions of its surplus. Not many millions would be needed. A very few, adroitly used in practically giving away selected dyes, would kill the business of even the strongest of our companies and leave us once more at the trust's mercy. Such an onslaught would be dangerous, even if German costs of production were as high as ours; but they are not. Even if the prices of labor and material are equal, an old dye industry can always undersell a new one. In making textiles or typewriters or paper or almost any other article that could be mentioned the maker gets practically all of his raw material back in finished product. In making dyes, however, some is lost in each of the many steps in the manufacture. How great each of these successive losses is depends on the experience of the manufacturer. The total of his successive losses when the work is done by an inexperienced man is enormous. We, new at the job, lose half our raw material as the work goes on. The Germans, who have been at it for 40 years, lose but a trifling proportion. Their costs are thus far below ours and are likely to remain so, though in a decreasing degree, for a long time. An attempt to meet under such conditions such an assault from such an adversary would require unheard-of tariff rates, and it is highly probable that by undervaluation, rebates, and concessions, coupled with the old German method of full-line forcing and bribery, the German trust could nullify their effect.

No antidumping law yet suggested seems at all likely to meet the conditions in this particular industry, on account of its immense complexity and the ease with which imports can be camouflaged by the skilled and unscrupulous German chemist. It is apparent, then, that any tariff bill which could possibly become law might and indeed probably would fail to insure the development of this industry which is so essential to our national defense and well-being. It is equally clear that the proposed license plan, faithfully administered, will certainly furnish the necessary protection, and that, too, without sacrificing revenue. Your committee believes that the industry is too important to be risked, and therefore recommends the adoption of this certain though unusual means of defense. Your committee makes this recommendation also as the only suitable answer to the similar British, French, and Japanese license laws. Those laws keep the competition of our dyes out of Great Britain, France, and Japan. Your committee does not believe that we should aid in building up their new subsidized industries by giving them at the expense of our producers unlimited access to our market. When by this simple expedient we can at the same time make sure of obtaining every foreign product we need and of building up our own vitally important industry, we feel that Congress ought not to hesitate or rest content with any doubtful remedy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 8078) introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] to regulate the importation of coal-tar products makes provision for a dye licensing commission, which I can not approve. The purpose of the bill is to protect the manufacture of dyestuffs in the United States, and with the tariff rates enumerated I find no fault, since they seem to be satisfactory to all parties in interest and are admitted to be sufficiently high for protective purposes. But the addition to these high tariff rates of a dye-licensing commission to keep out of the United States dyestuffs that are not manufactured here, and upon which many of our textile industries in the United States are dependent, is, as I see it, carrying the protective policy a step too far, in that the effect of it will be to foster monopoly in dye production, compel the users of dyes in the hundreds of allied industries to pay such prices for their working materials as the dye producers may see fit to impose, and put the business men concerned to unnecessary inconvenience.

Although the hearings upon the dyestuffs bill disclosed that the purpose on the part of the big American dyestuffs manufacturers and the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), to whom the Alien Property Custodian, at private sale, sold 4,500 German patents for $250,000, was to secure absolute protection against the importation of German dyes by creating a dye-licensing commission, it was manifest that the users of dyes, including manufacturers of leather, textiles—woolens and worsteds, cottons and silks—although believing in the protective principle and in favor of high tariff rates, are very much disturbed over the continuance in peace times of boards and war bureaus to whom they must go for the right to do business in their own way in conformity with law and the usual conditions that hold in the trade.

TYING UP THE DYE USER.

And that the proponents of the bill are aware of this feeling of unrest and dissatisfaction on the part of business men who desire to be relieved from the delays and annoyances of bureaucratic oversight is shown in the changes of front that have been made since the original bill, H. R. 2706, was presented, May 23, 1919. In that original bill high protective tariff rates were included, and many manufacturers, both dyers and consumers, heartily indorsed the program. Petitions were signed up by manufacturers of wools and woolens, cottons and silks, hosiery and underwear, in sympathy with the general proposition to keep German dyestuffs from undermining the dyemakers who had established themselves in the United States during the war.

They all realized that Germany had a strangle hold on the dyestuffs situation before the war and wished this country to be free as England has become free of that economic control. But when, on June 23, H. R. 6495, the forerunner of the present bill, H. R. 80783, was introduced, carrying the protective tariff rates of H. R. 2706, it was found to contain provision for a dye licensing commission which was to be appointed by the President, who had entrusted all of the German dye business to the Alien Property Custodian, which commission, notwithstanding the high tariff rates already proposed, was to have power to prevent imports except by license, which license was to involve such disclosures of the American applicant's business as might be deemed necessary "in the judgment of the commission having respect to reasonable terms as to price, quality, and delivery."

PLAN OF ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

The commission was to be given the power to limit licenses in such manner as it saw fit, so that the average business man, desiring to obtain dyes not procurable in the United States in order to prepare for the manufactured colored goods to be gotten ready for the spring trade, would be obliged to submit to "the judgment of the commission" before he could have authority to start the wheels of his mill running. This new bill, H. R. 6495, provoked considerable discussion, and those who appeared in support of it were chiefly the Alien Property Custodian, Mr. Garvan, and the general counsel for the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), Mr. Joseph H. Choate, jr., of New York, who had been associated with the Alien Property Custodian's Office.

Although representatives of the National Aniline & Chemical Co., which consolidated many of the American dyestuffs industries, were in attendance upon the hearings, neither they nor the Du Ponts, who manufacture dyestuffs, nor any other large dyestuffs manufacturers, appeared before the committee to justify the bill. The argument made by Mr. Choate, Alien Property Custodian Garvan, and others who appeared on behalf of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), was that the protective tariff rates in the bill, although much higher than in existing law, would not be sufficient to keep out German imports. On the other hand, while not opposing all reasonable restrictions upon German imports, textile manufacturers, and others protesting against the dye license commission, contended that American manufacturers should be free from the bureaucratic limitations the bill imposed. They said there were certain dyestuffs not manufactured in the United States, but for which the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) and others in the United States held the patents, the exclusion of which would not only deprive this country of its customs revenues but would prevent the consumers of dyestuffs here from obtaining materials they had been accustomed to use, which materials and dyestuffs in the hands of their competitors in England and elsewhere would permit those competitors to obtain a great lead over American manufacturers by shipping finished products into the United States, against which finished products, including hosiery, underwear, woolens, and silk goods, they would not be able to produce because the raw materials were not available.

PROTESTS CAUSE MODIFICATIONS.

The storm of protest against the licensing commission delayed the Ways and Means Committee in coming to a conclusion upon the bill, consideration of which was held up until July 24, when certain amendments modifying the licensing commission provisions were presented in committee to be printed. These modified suggestions, still including the obnoxious new bureau, somewhat sugar-coated, but still operating under the title "dye licensing commission," was preserved, and, with some additional modifications, is carried on into the present bill—H. R. 8078.

It is not my purpose to dwell extensively upon the long and somewhat sensational hearings in which Mr. Garvan, the Alien Property Custodian, and Mr. Choate took part. They are well worth reading, though they merely skim the surface of the vast field of activity covered by the Alien Property Custodian in his search for German holdings in the United States and his efforts to "Americanize" them. That is a chapter which may well stand for further elaboration.

But pertinent to the dyestuffs bill is a brief summary of what transpired up to the point of the organization of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.). In the "trading-with-the-enemy act," authorizing the creation by the President of the Alien Property Custodian, the presumption as well as the letter of the law was that the Alien Property Custodian should be "trustee" for German property taken and that the disposal of that property should ultimately be determined by Congress. And it is interesting here to observe that Americans whose property was taken in Germany are expecting to get that property back. Let that statement stand for the present.

CUSTODIAN OBTAINS GREAT POWERS.

By Executive order, by virtue of the "trading-with-the-enemy act," the President conferred great powers upon the Alien Property Custodian; Congress did also, by riders to appropriation bills passed while the war was on, and ultimately the Alien Property Custodian was permitted to sell German property, which he had seized, first at public sale and then at private sale. When it came to the disposal of 4,500 dyestuff patents, enemy owned, which the Alien Property Custodian seized, a plan was evolved in the office of the Alien Property Custodian to protect the dyestuff industry in the United States and to keep out German importations by utilizing these seized German patents and leasing them through the medium of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), an organization headed by some responsible gentlemen who obtained a charter under the laws of the State of Delaware, with a capital of $500,000. The trustees and officers and attorneys of this corporation, including the Alien Property Custodian, Francis P. Garvan, who is president, were all associated with the Alien Property Custodian's office in one capacity or another.

It is now largely through the agitation of those in control of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) that the support comes for the creation of the dye license commission. The Chemical Foundation thus created by Government officials has been recognized to a certain extent by the War Trade Board, now attached to the State Department, and by the Federal Trade Commission, whose chairman recently circularized those who hold licenses from the Federal Trade Commission, as to the advisability of their taking licenses from the Chemical Foundation (Inc.). It is a long story and one which is not fully told, even in the lengthy hearings of the Ways and Means Committee, hearings which so far as they have been printed should be carefully perused by Members of the House.

PROTECTION UPON PROTECTION.

Now, as to the bill before us: There is little or no serious objection to the protective-tariff rates on dyestuffs, as proposed in the bill. There is objection, however, to placing our extensive and widely diversified manufactories that are obliged to use dyestuffs under the control of a dye licensing commission which is admittedly in the interest of the dye manufacturers who have sprung up, and some of them consolidated, in the United States during the war. The protective tariff provided in the existing dyestuffs law was admitted to be sufficient prior to our entering the war in Europe. The rates proposed in this bill are so much higher than existing rates as to be almost prohibitive. They apply to dyes which come out of England, France, and Switzerland as well as to those which might come out of Germany. But, even if these barriers were not sufficient, there are other reasons why a new bureau, to be under the control of special interests at the expense and to the annoyance of legitimate business interests, should not be established.

First. The War Trade Board, which the President has covered over into the State Department by Executive order, is still in existence and has only recently issued an order opening up trade with Germany except as to dyes, dyestuffs, potash, drugs, or chemicals. How can unfair dyes or dyestuffs come into the United States under that order unless they are smuggled through England or some other country, which, if it can obtain dyestuffs from Germany, would have an advantage over the manufacturers of the United States, who can not obtain such dyestuffs?

Second. Under the terms of the peace treaty an Allies' reparation committee has taken control of the dyestuff situation, so far as Germany is concerned, and as to $20,000,000 worth of dyes, which the Chemical Foundation agents feared might be dumped upon this country, has agreed upon an apportionment amongst themselves. That constitutes a second barrier, evidently, as strong as British warships supported by the Allies can make it, against the admission into this country of materials that might permit the Germans to get an undue foothold here. If this country is to be treated as other countries expect to be treated, the allied supreme economic council will certainly afford protection against unfair German practices, i. e., if the United States is to be treated fairly with the other nations.

Third. All the war powers of the President are preserved, and most of his war boards in one form or another hold on until he proclaims peace, or until Congress abolishes them.

Fourth. The Chemical Foundation (Inc.), backed by the Federal Trade Commission and the Alien Property Custodian, controls the German patents, the use of which in the United States will enable it or its licensees to manufacture anything the Germans can manufacture, which patents, although taken over at private sale under an Executive order, are also protected by a clause in the treaty of peace, barring German nationals from ever making claim against the Alien Property Custodian or any other authority authorizing such private sale.

Why, then, with all these safeguards and the highest protective tariff rates conceded, should this new Government bureau—this dye licensing commission—be set up at the Government expense, to harass and delay those American business men who have already been overburdened with legislative restrictions and departmental functionaries during the war and whose normal activities represent an expenditure of $3,000,000,000?

TARIFF COMMISSION DOUBTFUL.

The Tariff Commission, which has gone extensively into the dyestuffs problem, does not seem to be enamored of the licensing commission idea, some of its members having been outspoken against it. At a meeting of the American Chemical Society at Buffalo, April 8, 1919, Mr. Culbertson, a member of the commission, having made a special study of the entire question, said:

Among the most—perhaps the most—urgent tariff problems which Congress will be called upon to consider fall within the chemical schedule. The reasons for this is obvious. The war's effect was, as I have suggested, more revolutionary among the chemical industries than elsewhere. I wish it were possible for me to discuss a number of chemical products worthy of consideration, but this can not be done within the limits of this address. Not all the items in the chemical schedule have an equal claim to legislative assistance. A few have none. Each should be considered on its own merits, keeping in mind the advantages of production, the availability of foreign supply, the needs of the American consumer, and the diversification and development of the structure of our industrial life. I shall speak specifically of the industry producing coal-tar products, for I regard it as a clear case deserving of legislative help.

Before hostilities ceased, Great Britain had declared the industry producing synthetic dyes essential to her national well-being. For its protection she has made a radical departure from her traditional policy of laissez faire in trade. She has provided State aid for the dye industry in the form of loans and grants for buildings and research. The importation of all dyes is prohibited except under license granted by a licensing committee. No dye is to be imported which the domestic industry is able to supply or for which an adequate substitute is made in the country. I believe that such a plan has been suggested as desirable for this country. For my part, I can not regard it with favor. In Great Britain the plan is in the early stages of experimentation. There the firms are comparatively few, and the Government is closely associated with them in the enterprise. In the United States our industry is too diversified and varied, the problems of administration too vast, the political consideration too uncertain to warrant meeting the dye problem with prohibition, importation licenses, and direct Federal supervision.

The alternative is a tariff which will equalize, with a fair margin, the conditions of competition between this country and abroad.

AN INNOVATION IN A TARIFF BILL.

Mr. Chairman, the licensing system is an innovation which is not contemplated in a protective tariff system as Republicans understand it. It is a war-born product, first tried out in England, where the country is small and the population dense. It should not be applied to a country like the United States, whose manufacturers and business men are far removed from headquarters at the Capital.

If licenses must be secured from Washington to obtain raw materials used by manufacturers, then the manufacturer in Philadelphia, or New York, or Boston who can get to Washington in a few hours has a decided advantage over his competitor in Chicago or St. Louis, in New Orleans, or Detroit, or San Francisco, who would have to wait days, and sometimes weeks, before he would know whether he could proceed with his business. The licensing system during the war was distressful enough to all those who had to deal with it. It is calculated to operate against anyone whose competitor happens to be close to the commission or who has superior facilities for dawdling around Washington, from office to office and commission to clerk, until his business is attended to.

The continuance of the system for normal business is proposed first in what is presumed to be the strongest case, that of dyestuffs, which involve German competition; but it is to be tried out on potash, the farmers' commodity, and if successful in these two instances, may become a fixture before the business men of the country are fully aware of the influences that are seeking to bind them up to it.

AMERICAN PRODUCERS READY TO COMPETE.

When the American producers of dyestuffs were consolidating their interests during the war and were announcing with evident satisfaction the growth of the industry in the United States, there was little or no complaint about the adequacy of governmental protection. In an announcement to the trade July, 1917, the E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., which had added the manufacture of coal-tar dyes and intermediates to its vast business in explosives, advised the trade that it did not fear its ability to stand against its competitors. I quote from the announcement of the company that it had decided to enter the coal-tar dye industry:

The explosive and coal-tar dye industries are closely allied. Both require intermediates, which we manufacture in a large way; both are highly scientific and thoroughly developed; and both require large technical and commercial organizations.

We start with (1) the necessary raw materials, products of this country, therefore not dependent upon Europe; (2) a chemical and engineering organization second to none in magnitude and scientific attainment; (3) unequaled plant and laboratory facilities; and (4) an adequate commercial organization.

Another concern which has taken a deep interest in the passage of the Longworth bill is the National Aniline & Chemical Co. (Inc.), a war-created consolidation, which includes the Schoelkopf Aniline & Chemical Works, Buffalo, N. Y.; W. Beckers Aniline & Chemical Works (Inc.); Benzol Products Co.; Marcus Hook, Del.; Standard Aniline Products Co., Wappingers Falls, N. Y.; Century Colors Corporation, including plant at Nutley, N. J., and sales organization in New York City; National Aniline & Chemical Co., sales organization in New York City, and miscellaneous products plants acquired from the Barrett Co.; General Chemical Co.; and Semet-Solvay Co. in New York and Pennsylvania.

This concern, which with its subsidiaries reported good business in the manufacture of American dyes during the war, announced in a circular dealing with its stock transactions that the plan of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) would have "the effect of totally excluding from the United States" the importation of such dyes or chemicals as were made in any country under patents now held by the Chemical Foundation (Inc.). I quote from this circular the following statement intended to support its prospectus for a disposal of stock:

The manufacture of coal-tar dyes is firmly established in the United States, approximately two-thirds of the total number of different dyes and shades which were formerly imported into the United States from Germany now being made by one or more American manufacturers. During 1917 American manufacturers of dyestuffs produced 180 different dyes, of which the National Aniline & Chemical Co. (Inc.) produced 106 dyes, including 38 dyes not made by any other American producer. The total production of finished coal-tar dyes and chemicals from 81 establishments in the United States during 1917, exclusive of explosives and synthetic phenolic resins, represented a value of approximately $69,000,000.

AIDED BY ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

The Alien Property Custodian, acting under the authority of the amended trading-with-the-enemy act of November 4, 1918, has organized a corporation known as the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), all of whose $500,000 capital stock has been subscribed for at par in cash by a large number of American manufacturers of chemicals and dyestuffs. The Chemical Foundation (Inc.) has purchased from the Alien Property Custodian for $250,000 about 4,500 patents covering chemical processes and products registered in the United States by German and other enemy alien owners. The Chemical Foundation (Inc.) will issue without discrimination nonexclusive license to any American manufacturer who may make application therefor, under the terms of which the American manufacturer may use or make the patented processes and products on a moderate royalty basis. The effect of this plan will be to totally exclude from the United States the importation of any dyes or chemicals made in any country in the world under any of the patents held by the Chemical Foundation (Inc.). Of the subscribed capital of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), $250,000 is available as a working fund for the prosecution of actions involving the importation or manufacture of products infringing on the patents to which the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) has acquired title.

The patents now held by the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) cover most of the processes and products used in the dye industry; and in addition to this protection afforded under the patent laws, there is now in effect the tariff act of September 8, 1916, which imposes a heavy ad valorem duty on finished dyestuffs made from coal tar and smaller ad valorem duties on intermediates, together with specific duties on both finished products and intermediates. These customs duties apply to all synthetic dyestuffs imported, wherever made and by whatever process.

The officers of the National Aniline & Chemical Co. (Inc.) are men who were interested in importing German dyes prior to the war and manufactured them in the United States during the war, when they had no foreign competition and should therefore be competent to testify as to their ability to cope with foreign trade now. Circulars issued by agents of this company throw a little more light on this subject and justify the setting up of an interrogation point as to why, having all the protection above described, they still want a license commission to govern the distribution of dyes needed by manufacturers to carry on their business. I quote a few sample expressions of confidence with regard to the American dye industry's ability to take care of itself. These extracts are from trade circulars issued by the National Aniline & Chemical Co.:

CAN COMPETE WITH GERMANS.

The Germans will enjoy no supply of raw materials or intermediates which the National Co. does not now possess. With the depreciated currency and the labor unrest in Germany, it is not to be expected that the labor costs of the German manufacturers in the future will be proportionately as low as in the past. With the protective tariff on dyestuffs and the exclusions steps taken by the Alien Property Custodian, the National Co. certainly has no cause to fear German competition for some time to come.

* * * * * * *

Under the tariff act of September 8, 1916, all finished dyes are taxed 30 per cent ad valorem and 5 cents a pound specific duty, with a reduction each year after 1921 in the specific duty of 1 cent a pound. Intermediates are taxed under that law 15 per cent ad valorem and 2½ cents a pound specific duty, with a reduction of one-half cent a pound per year after 1921. Raw materials are admitted free of duty. On dyes worth $1 a pound, this duty would amount to 35 cents a pound.

* * * * * * *

The Chemical Foundation (Inc.) has been organized by the Alien Property Custodian with a capital stock of $500,000, and has acquired title to about 4,500 patents on processes and products covering all kinds of dyes and other chemicals which were registered in the United States by Germans or other alien enemies. The Chemical Foundation (Inc.) will issue nonexclusive licenses to American manufacturers to use these patents on a moderate royalty basis, and will protect all holders of licenses under these patents from the manufacture in the United States or the importation into the United States of all dyes or other chemicals made in any other country in the world under processes which infringe on the patents to which the Chemical Foundation holds title.

And here follow a few sidelights on the dyestuffs situation:

Because of its large earnings the company will be subject to heavy Federal taxes in 1918. It is pursuing a conservative policy of charging off out of earnings all normal depreciation and obsolescence of its plant, and is also setting aside extraordinary depreciation reserved to mark off a part of the excessive war costs involved in the construction of its plants built since 1914.

* * * * * * *

There has been a temporary slowing up of purchases of dyestuffs by the textile industry since the signing of the armistice, but the National Co. has not made any general reductions in the prices of its products, the last cut in prices having taken place in the spring of 1918. The gross sales for 1919 may not be as large as for 1918; but, on the other hand, the cost of raw materials shows a declining tendency. The appropriations for depreciation and tax reserves in 1919 probably will not be as large as in 1918.

* * * * * * *

The stock which the syndicate is offering was not bought from the company, but was acquired from various minority stockholders in the company who received the stock originally in 1917 in part payment for their interests in certain of the merged companies.

BRIDGES ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER, LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Speaker to lay before the House S. 2594, to extend the time for the construction of the Broadway Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark., a similar House bill having been favorably reported and being on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House S. 2594, a similar House bill having been favorably reported.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto, authorized by act of Congress approved August 7, 1914, to be built from Broadway Street, in the city of Little Rock, Ark., to a point on the north bank of said river, in the city of Argenta, county of Pulaski, Ark., are hereby extended one year and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. JACOWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the corresponding House bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JACOWAY. I ask the Speaker to lay before the House S. 2595, another bill for a similar purpose. A corresponding House bill has been favorably reported by the committee and is on the calendar.

The Speaker laid before the House the bill (S. 2595) to extend the time for the construction of the Main Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto, authorized by act of Congress approved October 6, 1917, to be built across the Arkansas River at the city of Little Rock on the site now occupied by the free highway bridge constructed by said county in the years 1896 and 1897, are hereby extended one year and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. JACOWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the corresponding House bill was ordered to lie on the table.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present for consideration a privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 211.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to employ such stenographic, clerical, and legal assistance, and such accountants, and to have such printing and binding done, as it may deem necessary. All expenses that may be incurred by said committee, including the expenses of any subcommittee thereof, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers signed by the chairman of said committee and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 3, after the word "empower," insert the words "during the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress."

In the same line, after the word "stenographic," insert the word "and."

In the same line, after the word "clerical," strike out the words "and legal assistance."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 184.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to employ such stenographic, clerical, and legal assistance and such accountants, and to have such printing and binding done as it may deem necessary.

All expenses that may be incurred by said committee, including the expenses of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, when sitting outside of the District of Columbia, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers signed by the chairman of said committee, or by the chairman of a subcommittee, where such expenses are incurred by such subcommittee.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered during the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress to employ such stenographic and clerical assistance and such accountants, and to have such printing and binding done as it may deem necessary. All expenses that may be incurred by the said committee, including the expenses of any subcommittee thereof, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers signed by the chairman of said committee and approved by the Committee on Accounts."

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have not taken up much time of the House in opposing clerical assistance for committees. I have not done it when any other resolution has been before the House. I think this is a piece of pure extravagance. I can not give my consent to vote for it.

Let me tell you what this resolution is about, so that you who vote for it can vote with your eyes open. This resolution provides for clerical assistance and accountants without any limit, with bars down for this Expenditure Committee of the Navy Department. I assert that this is pure extravagance. I want to say to the Members of the House that the committee has already allowed them a clerk. Members will remember that many of these expenditure committees were not allowed a clerk during the first session of the last Congress, a number during the second session of the last Congress, and none of them, so far as I recall, has been allowed in the last session of the last Congress. I think that most of them were allowed a clerk during the second or long session.

Now, I want to call attention to this: Remember we have allowed them a clerk, and this is in addition to that clerk—that they be allowed additional clerical assistance and accountants, and have printing and binding done. You know the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department has never had any experience in investigating the Navy. Here is the Member of Congress from Pennsylvania, Mr. BUTLER, chairman of the Naval Committee; the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. KELLEY; the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. PADGETT; and a great many able men, men of long experience on this committee. I insist that they have to investigate everything connected with the Navy Department in making appropriations. When the chairman on Expenditures in the Navy Department was before the committee in support of this resolution, we allowed him a clerk, but he did not put his finger on any single specific thing that he wanted to investigate. They have only had one meeting, as suggested by my colleague, who is on the committee. I call attention to the Members of the House who are in favor of economy that there is no limit to the expense that might be incurred.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does not the gentleman think it is rather late in the day for him to criticize us about extravagance?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have always been in favor of economy, always voted for economy, and it is never too late to talk about it. You voted last year against allowing this side of the House to have a clerk for this committee. And yet, no sooner do you have the power, than you come every morning, and the Committee on Accounts is besieged by people asking for clerical assistance. We have just passed a resolution allowing the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department to make an investigation. They claim that they want to investigate the War Risk, and we, thinking they had made out a fair case before the Committee on Accounts—showing that it is not a partisan question—we did not oppose it. We said if there is anything to investigate, why, investigate it. But we said to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, if you have anything you want to investigate we will give you a clerk, and if you find there is really something you want to investigate and really want some assistance then come before the Committee on Accounts and make a proper showing, and we will allow it.

But let me tell that side of the House, as well as our own side, that it will not be 30 days until every single solitary one of the little expenditure committees will be down before the Committee on Accounts with similar resolutions, and they will want clerical assistance unlimited, as this is unlimited; they will want accountants unlimited, and it is simply pure political bunk. That is all there is to it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is all there is to it; there is no need of our concealing it.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. I have noticed a great deal of solicitude on the part of gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House over the Republicans executing a facilis descensus in Averno. Why is the gentleman so disturbed over our committing mistakes?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, I have never been disturbed over your committing mistakes. I never saw the Republican Party do anything but make blunders all of my life, and I have gotten used to their doing that, but I want to call attention to this resolution so that the Members of the House may understand it, so that they will vote for it with their eyes open, so that they will understand that they have already been allotted a clerk, and that we are not denying them proper clerical assistance, and that this is in addition to the clerk already allowed by the committee.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to ask the gentleman if any showing was made that this Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department would need other clerical assistance than that of the clerks to their own committees?

Mr. HASTINGS. I assert positively none whatever, and as I remember the statement before the committee that that committee had but one meeting. Of course everybody knows that the committee presided over by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], the Committee on Naval Affairs, investigates every phase of this question. It has the Secretary of the Navy and other naval officials before it, and it is for that reason that we oppose the passage of this resolution. We do not believe that the resolution ought to be favorably acted upon, and we are opposed to it.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Was there any showing made at all before the committee that they intended to investigate the Navy Department?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, the chairman came in and generally said that he wanted to investigate it, but there was no showing of anything in particular he wanted to investigate; none whatever.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKELL].

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is the usual resolution providing ways and means so that the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department can proceed with its important work. This resolution is substantially the language of the resolution which you passed authorizing the select committee to investigate the War Department. The Democrats right along have been in favor of these investigations. They have courted them, claiming there was no fear of the outcome, when, lo and behold, our friend from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] who, gentlemen will remember, in the last Congress was willing to pass a resolution here providing for the payment of two salaries to a clerk holding two positions, to-day camouflages his opposition against this resolution which, if defeated, defeats the investigation of the Navy Department. It is true that the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department has had but one meeting in this session of Congress, but gentlemen know the committee has been completed in its membership only during the last week or 10 days. We want to start during the recess, if we are to have one, and make up for lost time. We want to conduct a thorough investigation into the affairs of the Navy Department, and gentlemen of the minority in the past have said that they were in favor of just that kind of a proposition. Why put obstacles and impediments in our way in accomplishing the very things which you have said and proclaimed from the housetops you wanted us to do? You can join hands with us in passing this resolution and provide us the ways and means to conduct the investigation. My friend has made several misstatements. One of them is that this Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department has a clerk. We have none.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I know the gentleman perhaps does not know it, but we did authorize a favorable report upon the other resolution unanimously the day before. I do not know whether the chairman has presented it or not, but I submit to the chairman whether we have not done that.

Mr. HASKELL. I decline to yield for a speech. My friend from Oklahoma has also opposed giving us counsel for this committee. The minority have opposed giving us counsel. I think as practical men we all recognize the necessity in a great investigation of having counsel to assist the committee. The resolution as now reported denies us counsel, and so the members of the committee must act as counsel and perform the other work as well. The minority already have gone back upon their previous statement that they were willing to cooperate with the majority to have the light of publicity turned on the affairs of the administration, and they are restricting and limiting us. They have taken away our counsel, and now my friend from Oklahoma, who, as I say, in the last Congress was willing to vote for a resolution to pay a clerk in two separate positions, to give him a double salary, to-day has the temerity to oppose a resolution which is in the interest of turning the light of publicity upon the affairs in the Navy Department, vindicating that department if nothing improper exists, and if it does exist, then calling it to the attention of the people of the country.

I respectfully submit that it requires no lengthy argument to the Members of this House, but that you will all recognize the fairness of this resolution, the necessity for it, the expediency, and the purpose of it, so if we are to recess we can start in this work and keep after it until we have concluded it to your satisfaction and bring our report in here of the work done. No abuse will be taken by the committee of the authority conferred upon us, not one penny will be spent except as necessary, and my friend need have no fear that there will be any unnecessary expenditure of money by the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department. [Applause.]

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH].

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as a member of the Committee on Accounts I want to go on record in opposition to this resolution. I do not believe that the best interest of this country—I am trying to view it from the standpoint of one who looks above partisanship—is going to be served by turning loose every committee of this House with unlimited authority to employ all the clerks, stenographers, or assistants that they may wish, and then place their hands in the Public Treasury and make the American people stand for the bills. [Applause.] The time has come in the history of legislation that it is necessary to stop somewhere, and in the name of reason, men, why shall we not stop when we have already provided this committee with one clerk, which will take care of any or all the investigations that it cares to make. [Applause.] The committee calling for these broad powers has met but one time since Congress has been in session. The chairman himself did not say to this House that they expected to work during the vacation, if there was one. He said they expected they might work or something of that kind. Gentlemen, I emphasize we must call a halt, and now is the time to do it. [Applause.] This committee has already been given one clerk, and the Naval Committee of the House has authority to investigate everything pertaining to the Navy Department, and to pass this legislation will amount to taking off all restrictions and giving the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department authority to incur every character of expense, some of which, at least, we ought not to pay. Another thing, this is but the beginning of the end. If we pass this legislation, we are going to be flooded with other similar resolutions. Did you hear the argument of the gentleman, the distinguished chairman of this committee, who has just preceded me—he said they wanted legal assistance. The select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department has legal assistance.

They are modeling their resolution after the one creating the special committee. As a Member of this House and of the Democratic Party, I am not opposed to investigations. I am willing that the light of the truth may shine through from beginning to end of every governmental agency, and if there are those who can not stand the sunshine of truth I, for one, say let him stand out and let the American people see him. [Applause.] There is absolutely no reason why we should pour the public money out recklessly and needlessly. I warn you we have no control over these expenditures when this resolution is finally passed. I repeat, gentlemen of the House, it is time to call a halt. Let your vote be against this resolution. If the gentlemen of the committee, in fact, want to investigate and will come back to our committee and tell us that one clerk is not sufficient and point out to us the further assistance necessary, I am sure that the Committee on Accounts will give them such assistance as is really necessary, but to give them blanket authority is a dangerous precedent. This resolution should be voted down. [Applause.]

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. PARRISH) there were—ayes 62, noes 52.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Twenty-six gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is not necessary. It is an automatic call. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the resolution will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 148, nays 110, answered "present" 1, not voting 169, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. LANGLEY (for resolution) with Mr. CANTRILL (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. WINSLOW with Mr. STEDMAN.

Mr. MONDELL with Mr. RUCKER.

Mr. ANTHONY with Mr. BRAND.

Mr. PURNELL with Mr. RIORDAN.

Mr. HUTCHINSON with Mr. DOREMUS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas with Mr. MCKEOWN.

Mr. SELLS with Mr. LARSEN.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan with Mr. GARNER.

Mr. ESCH with Mr. CARTER.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 5418. An act increasing the pay of printers and pressmen employed in the Government Printing Office, and for other purposes.

SPECIAL EMPLOYEES UNDER THE DOORKEEPER.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois submits a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 154.

Resolved, That the salaries of the two special employees of the House be $1,800 per annum: Provided, That the said salaries be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives until otherwise provided by law.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That there be paid from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives additional compensation at the rate of $300 per annum, payable monthly, to the special employee of the office of the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, what is this?

Mr. IRELAND. A resolution granting $300 additional compensation to the special employee of the Doorkeeper, which makes that office conform with the corresponding office on the minority side. It is the same as we did a short time ago with respect to the special employee of the minority. This is to grant the same additional compensation to the corresponding employee on the majority side.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I just want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. IRELAND. Very well.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are we going to raise all salaries before we quit? [Laughter.]

Mr. IRELAND. I can not say that we will follow the Democratic precedent by doing that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You are not going to raise the salaries of Congressmen? [Laughter.]

Mr. IRELAND. I could not say as to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

JOEL GRAYSON.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I submit another privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois submits another privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 141.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the rate of $2,500 per annum for the services of Joel Grayson in the House document room in lieu of the compensation now being paid to him.

With committee amendments, as follows:

After the word "law," in line 2, insert the word "additional." Strike out on line 3 "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$350, payable monthly," and after the word "annum" insert the words "payable monthly," and after the word "room," in line 4, strike out the words "in lieu of the compensation now being paid to him," so that as amended the resolution will read

"Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, additional compensation at the rate of $350 per annum, payable monthly, for the services of Joel Grayson in the House Document Room."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What salary will this gentleman receive under the committee amendment? Will it be less than $2,500, or equal to it, as provided in the original resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. I believe it will be a little bit less. I can not be positive as to that. We passed on several resolutions.

Mr. BLANTON. Can not the gentleman tell? It is the gentleman's resolution.

Mr. HASTINGS. He will get exactly $2,500, as I recall, under this amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. What was the purpose of the committee amendment—to leave the compensation exactly where it was before it was amended?

Mr. IRELAND. No; it does not do anything of the kind.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think I can explain it, if the gentleman will yield to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Three hundred and fifty dollars will come out of the contingent fund.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is his salary now?

Mr. HASTINGS. Two thousand one hundred and fifty dollars. Three hundred and fifty dollars comes out of the contingent fund of the House, and $2,150 comes out of the regular appropriation, so that he gets only $2,500 from both of them together.

Mr. IRELAND. The $2,150 is paid out of the appropriation so as not to beggar the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HASTINGS. And adding the two amounts together it makes $2,500.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

W. RAY LOOMIS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I beg the further indulgence of the House for a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois submits a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 182.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for by law, compensation at the rate of $3,000 per annum, payable monthly, to W. Ray Loomis for his services as editor and compiler of the Weekly Compendium and Monthly Compendium and as assistant in the document room.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 3 strike out "$3,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is reported by the Committee on Accounts without recommendation, because while we are well aware of the ability and value of the services of the man named in the resolution it is impossible for us to determine whether a majority of the membership of the House think the Weekly and Monthly Compendium of sufficient value to be continued. About the only way we can arrive at a conclusion is to present the resolution to the House for their action. You have all received the compendium. Some of you are very strong in its praises and others have not used it to any great extent. The views of the House on the merits of this publication should control the action of the House on this resolution. So it was with that thought that the committee reported it to the House for its action without recommendation.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Loomis does regular work in the document room at present in addition to getting out this compendium?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; that is the understanding—that he is to continue to do that.

Mr. HASTINGS. The resolution so provides?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does this gentleman draw any other salary?

Mr. IRELAND. No; he does not, and he has not been on the pay roll at all since July 17, I believe, though he is serving at present in the document room in place of an appointee who has not yet arrived. His services are in demand there.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. If he is the man whom I have in mind, he and Mr. Grayson are the two most experienced men in the document room.

Mr. IRELAND. I understand they are.

Mr. WINGO. And their services are really very valuable, aside from this special work that Mr. Loomis does?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. There is no question about the man's efficiency?

Mr. IRELAND. I think not. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] on this question such time as he may desire.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I want to supplement the statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. IRELAND] by saying that heretofore Mr. Loomis has received $3,600 per annum, $2,100 as an assistant in the document room and $1,500 for this special work of editing and compiling the Weekly and Monthly Compendium. The only salary he will receive hereafter, as provided in this resolution, is $2,500, which is $1,100 less than he has received heretofore, not taking into account the bonus. This resolution expressly provides that he shall not only render these service but that he shall also act as assistant in the document room, as he has heretofore done. As was suggested by a question awhile ago, Mr. Grayson has been retained through all the different administrations of the House on both sides, because of his efficiency and knowledge, and he and Mr. Loomis are the two most experienced men in the document room. I think it is highly important that both of them be retained. In addition to rendering these special services, Mr. Loomis is always well informed, and those of you who desire to do so can find out from him the status of legislation, and the whereabouts of riders and other provisions about which you receive inquiries. He has consented to a reduction of his salary to $2,500, which is $1,100 less than he has heretofore received, and I believe that his services will be well worth the price.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask whether the gentleman does not think that the Weekly and Monthly Compendium is a great assistance to the House, and to the new Members especially?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; I think it is to anyone active on the floor of the House in following the bills. It must be a great help.

Mr. GARLAND. From the fact that we want to have the compendium I think it is worth while to keep this employee, and, Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out $2,500 and inserting $3,600.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the committee amendment by striking out $2,500 and inserting $3,600.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I hope that will not be done. I know Mr. Grayson, who has been continually in the document room for many years. I think $2,500 is proper pay for him, and if that resolution had not passed the House, if this man's pay is to be increased to $3,600, certainly Joel Grayson should have his increased to that amount, because he can give this man cards and spades and then be more competent. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this question was very thoroughly considered by the committee. I hope the committee amendment will be adopted and that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be voted down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered to the committee amendment by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

GEORGE W. SABINE.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 219.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, increased compensation at the rate of $700 per annum for the services of George W. Sabine, Librarian on the floor of the House of Representatives, in lieu of the compensation now being paid to him.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 3, page 1, strike out "$700" and insert "$300."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

AUGUST BUEHNE.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 162.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $500 to August Buehne for extra services rendered the Members of the House of Representatives during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress and first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress as employee detailed from the Government Printing Office.

Mr. GARRETT. Can the gentleman tell the House what the condition of the contingent fund of the House is?

Mr. IRELAND. I can, approximately. I should say $65,000 or $68,000.

Mr. GARRETT. That much is on hand now?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; but by the time the war-expenditure committee gets through with it I think there will be little left.

Mr. SISSON. Is this the usual amount paid to this employee?

Mr. IRELAND. This man from the document room draws a salary of $950 a year, and it has been the custom in the past to award him $500 every second session.

Mr. SISSON. Was anything paid him for the last session?

Mr. IRELAND. Not for the third session of the Sixty-fifth or the first session of the Sixty-sixth. The gentleman from Illinois, Dr. FOSTER, usually attended to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LABORATORY GLASSWARE, PORCELAIN WARE, AND OPTICAL GLASS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7785, and pending that, as I do not see the gentleman from North Carolina here, I want to see if I can arrange for some time. The gentleman from North Carolina said he wanted one hour on that side.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Will the gentleman hold up that matter until to-morrow?

Mr. FORDNEY. What I would like to do is to get the bill under way and then adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. We can fix the time when the gentleman from North Carolina comes into the House. We can fix it in the morning before we go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORDNEY. It was suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that we have two hours, one hour on each side. If that is agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois, I will ask that two hours be allowed for general debate, one-half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and one-half by myself.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. That may be ample; I do not know whether it is or not. I wish the gentleman would wait and he can make his request in the morning.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the title of the bill read.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will explain that to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. But the title will show it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7785) to provide revenue for the Government, to establish and maintain in the United States the manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, scientific and surgical instruments.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen do not wish to adjourn. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois we would better agree on time for general debate now.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman that that was the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] this afternoon.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. If the gentleman has that arrangement with Mr. KITCHIN, it is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be two hours of general debate, one-half of that time to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7785, and pending that asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman propose to have anything but general debate to-day?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I believe not. At least I would rather not, if that is the wish of the House.

Mr. CANNON. I think we ought to have some understanding about that. If it is to be considered under the five-minute rule, notice of that fact ought to be given now.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the floor leader does not want us to adjourn now. I do not know how long he wants us to remain in session to-night. I am willing to stay here until we finish the bill, if necessary. It is a very important bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If that side of the House is to comply with the suggestion made by the President to do away with the recess, what is the use of working on to-night?

Mr. FORDNEY. If this side of the House was of the same frame of mind as I am they would tell the President that we are going home. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I would tell him the same thing.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7785.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7785.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7785, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7785) to provide revenue for the Government, to establish and maintain in the United States the manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, optical glass, scientific and surgical instruments.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon articles named herein, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), the rates of duties herein prescribed, namely:

Glasswares and porcelain wares, laboratory apparatus, and other apparatus and appliances wholly or in part of glass or porcelain, for use in the sciences or in analyzing or testing or for use in education, 60 per cent ad valorem.

Optical glass in any and all forms or glass for use in optical instruments or for any optical purposes, and all instruments and appliances of any and all kinds containing parts of optical glass or used for optical purposes, finished or unfinished, 45 per cent ad valorem.

Philisophical, scientific, and laboratory apparatus, utensils, instruments, and appliances and parts thereof, finished or unfinished, and preparations, including bottles and boxes containing the same, not otherwise provided for, 45 per cent ad valorem.

Surgical and dental instruments, or parts thereof, made wholly or in part of iron, steel, copper, brass, nickel, aluminum, or other metal, finished or unfinished, 60 per cent ad valorem.

That all articles provided for in this act shall not be entitled to free entry under paragraph 573 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913.

SEC. 2. That all provisions of any act or acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 8076, a bill to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I also ask leave to file the minority views on that bill sometime during the day or to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to file minority views sometime during the day or to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask the privilege of revising and extending my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the House is designed chiefly to protect and foster, so far as it is practicable to do so by reasonable legislation, the manufacture of chemical glassware and chemical porcelain ware, optical glass, scientific instruments and apparatus, and surgical and dental instruments; industries which, I might say, were forced into existence in this country because of our needs due to our activities in the World War.

The bill provides an increase of 15 per cent in the rate of duty on chemical glassware, 10 per cent on porcelain ware, 25 per cent on scientific instruments, 40 per cent on surgical and dental instruments, and it removes optical glass from the free list and places thereon a duty of 45 per cent. In addition to these specific rates, the bill also repeals the duty-free provisions of paragraph 573 of the present tariff act, in so far as it applies to the products of these industries.

With these increased rates it is felt that our revenues will be materially increased if American consumers still insist upon buying these supplies in foreign markets.

While these industries are each separate and distinct, they are so closely allied and the history of the development of each industry so closely parallels the other, that, for the sake of brevity, I shall refer to them collectively, more or less, in my remarks.

What we seek to accomplish under this bill is to build up a wall of protection around these essential "infant industries," such as will enable them to continue in operation and not force them out of business by compelling them to compete with the low-labor conditions of Europe, and especially of the Orient; the latter will be the inevitable result, and that very soon, if the industries are not given this protection.

We feel that now, immediately, national encouragement should be given to these industries, because they are the "key" industries of the country, without the existence of which America can not hope to remain economically free and commercially independent, as we are at this moment.

By "key" industries, I mean that the products of these industries are used not only for scientific instruction in our schools and colleges, but in all of the commercial industries of any importance to the welfare of the country and in our governmental activities, and without them our national safety is jeopardized.

Chemical apparatus and scientific instruments are indispensable in the laboratories which control the manufacture of steel, iron, paper, rubber, dyes, chemicals, sugar, cotton, munitions, and explosives.

They are necessary adjuncts in the laboratories of every important industry in every part of our country for testing and analyzing the things which go into the make-up of the product of these various industries, as well as for testing and analyzing the product itself. There is no industry of any importance that does not now possess a well-equipped laboratory and retain a corps of expert chemists.

Prior to the outbreak of the war, in 1914, there was but a very limited quantity of the lower grades of chemical glassware manufactured in the United States; there was practically no optical glass made in this country, and our production of other scientific instruments was not sufficient to take care of our peaceful domestic needs. Most of these supplies were imported from Germany and Austria.

Following the outbreak of the war and up until the time England had established a strict blockade against the Central Powers a sufficient quantity of these materials and supplies had been imported to take care of our needs for a year or two.

But when the United States entered the war and the demands of our Government for these supplies increased to an enormous extent it was found that the country was absolutely bare of chemical glass of the higher kinds and of optical glass. It was further found that none of our factories knew the manufacturing processes and that it was impossible to find skilled mechanics to perform the work.

For instance, there was no glass in the country that could be used for gun sights, periscopes, field glasses, or for any of the innumerable uses that the Army and Navy must make of glass of this sort.

We all have fresh in our minds the appeal of our Navy Department, through the columns of the press and by every other means, to attract the attention of American people, to "Lend the Navy your eyes." Binoculars, telescopes, field glasses, and other cast-off articles of the like were eagerly sought from whomsoever could lend them for use of our men on the ships patroling the seas.

And it is a fact that the gun sights and range finders on our ships and on the battle fields, through the aid of which our gallant lads in the Navy were able to shoot down the destructive U-boats and by the use of which our brave boys in the Artillery were able to get a bead on the enemy and mow them down with the withering and accurate gunfire for which they soon became noted, were instruments many of which were manufactured in Germany and imported into this country.

It is obvious to all that without field glasses, without range finders, without gun sights, and the like, an Army or Navy is comparatively blind. It is equally obvious that without chemical apparatus and instruments the production of high explosives is almost impossible, and an element of danger is necessarily introduced wherever poor materials must be substituted for proper materials in the manufacture of these high explosives.

It was found that there was not an adequate supply of chemical glassware to give efficient service to our scientific and manufacturing industries or to the various scientific departments of the Government; the same may be said of scientific instruments which were so imperatively needed, and, as a result, on entering the war the United States found itself without these vitally essential necessities.

Frantic appeals were made to the American manufacturers to come to the aid of their country by equipping their plants for the manufacture of these apparatus and instruments.

Thanks to the patriotism and genius of the men appealed to, they were able to meet the demands of their Government in increasing quantities, for both the employer and the employee put their shoulders to the wheel when they realized that so much was needed from them to support and back up the boys who had gone "over there" to do the fighting.

There were numerous obstacles to surmount in developing these industries to a state of efficiency. Although there were many skilled mechanics of years of training along other lines of glasswork, the development of the chemical line was at first a slow proposition and it took months before these highly trained mechanics became proficient in turning out this chemical ware. This period of training and development naturally resulted in heavy financial loss to the manufacturers.

Estimates of the value of imported chemical glassware before the war by two of the principal importers for the year 1913, as compiled by the United States Tariff Commission, place it from $1,200,000 to $1,500,000; of these totals the value of the merchandise imported free of duty for educational institutions the same year was $500,000 to $800,000, or from 42 per cent to about 53 per cent.

In 1915 American factories and shops produced chemical glassware to the value of $950,319, according to the report of the Tariff Commission, and in 1918 it was valued at $2,865,774.

With the lifting of the blockade against Germany, we may expect an immediate renewal of competition from that country. But a more serious competition, and one that is giving greater anxiety to the American manufacturer, is the competition of Japan. Japan, like America, has been developing these industries only since the outbreak of the war.

Lately Japanese goods have flooded the American markets, and it must be obvious to everyone that with the present-day price of American labor, our manufacturers can not compete with the products of the cheap labor of Japan.

I am advised by the Secretary of Commerce, in response to an inquiry addressed to him asking for information as to the wages paid to skilled workmen engaged in the glass industry in Japan, that the wages are as follows:

> The average daily wages in 1917 for males over 15 years of age was 37½ cents; for females 16½ cents. For males under 15 years of age 14 cents and for females 11 cents. The number of working days in a year is given as 283, and the hours per day as 11½.

The Secretary further advised me, under date of June 26 of this year that the—> probable wages for 1918 are: For males over 15 years of age, 53 cents; for females, 24 cents; males under 15 years of age, 20 cents, and females 15 cents.

The average daily wages for skilled glass workers in the United States is $6.60. Child labor is not employed, and there are but few females employed in the industry.

England, soon after the outbreak of the war, found herself in much the same predicament as did America later on. Practically all of these essential supplies used by England was imported from Germany and Austria. Like America, too, England has made much progress in the development of these industries, and efforts are now being made to not only keep the industry in existence but to have it compete in foreign markets.

I am advised that England is now contemplating the absolute barring out of imports of chemical glassware and optical glass in order that the development of these industries in her own country may continue, because she considers that these industries are vital for the national protection.

The New York Sun of June 22, 1919, reprints an article taken from the London Times with reference to the support being given to the chemical-glassware industry in England, by the British Government, in which it is stated that a department of glass technology was opened at Sheffield University with the support of the Government, and that the Government has been asked to provide $364,987 over a period of five years, and the manufacturers will contribute a further sum of $121,662.

The American manufacturers neither ask for nor do they want a subsidy of any kind; they merely want the adoption of legislation which will give them a fair chance to compete in the open markets with foreign countries.

ELIMINATION OF THE DUTY-FREE CLAUSE.

The last section of this bill provides for the elimination of paragraph 573 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, and prior acts, known as the "duty-free" clause, under which educational institutions and the like were permitted to import these scientific instruments and apparatus free of duty when they were to be used solely for educational purposes.

It is estimated that about one-half of the imports of scientific instruments and apparatus into this country comes in under this duty-free clause. This actually means that the American manufacturer is shut off from bidding or competing for one-half of the demands of this country.

This paragraph was first incorporated in the tariff act of 1790. It was ostensibly for the purpose of encouraging higher education in this country, and in the early history of our country's development it unquestionably was a wise and proper thing to do.

But the perpetuation of this duty free clause in our later tariff laws has done more to retard the manufacture of these chemical essentials in this country than any other one thing.

Not only did it deprive our manufacturers of one-half of the market for these supplies, but under the cloak of this paragraph there was inaugurated in our schools and colleges a propaganda of the most vicious character, which filled the minds of the youth of our country with the idea that America could not make the instruments and apparatus which they needed in their education. From the time our young men entered our institutions of higher education they were confronted with instruments and apparatus which bore the stamp, "Made in Germany."

They were told that American workmen could not make satisfactorily the things which they saw there in the laboratories and that it was necessary to import these things from Germany. This was so thoroughly drilled into them that they came out of school with their minds educated to that belief and they unconsciously carried on this propaganda, either in commercial industries or in colleges where they took up the vocation of teaching.

Heretofore this was all German propaganda, but with the advent of the Japanese into these industries we can expect the same tactics from them, unless we stop it here and now before Japan has an opportunity to get a foothold.

I am happy to say that most of our celebrated chemists and college professors are now awake to the use that has been made of our institutions of learning in carrying on this foreign propaganda, and they are now carrying on a campaign of education with the idea of substituting the trade-mark "Made in America" for "Made in Germany," or "Made in Japan," or made in any other country.

To that end they are almost universally of the opinion that the "duty-free" privilege to educational institutions should be withdrawn and that our universities should be the first to take up and teach the slogan of "America for American-made goods first, last, and all the time."

Let me quote briefly from the testimony of some of the witnesses who appeared at the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means.

These men were all of the opinion that the tariff rates as carried in this bill should be enacted into law. They represented the manufacturers of these goods, the workmen who are engaged in the industries, and the American Chemical Society, representing practically all of the chemists of the country. They were likewise of the opinion that the duty-free clause should be eliminated.

In this connection I desire to say that I have not received a single protest against the passage of the bill, either from people engaged in manufacturing or importing this ware or from any school, college, or university.

I want to quote very briefly from the testimony of the various people who testified before the Committee on Ways and Means in reference to this matter. We held our hearings on June 11, 12, and 13 of this year, and I want to call attention to the various witnesses who testified before the committee, and I say in this connection that up to the present time there has not been a complaint by either a manufacturer or a college regarding the new duties which we propose to impose. I quote very briefly from the statement of Mr. E. C. Sullivan, Corning Glassware Works, manufacturers of Pyrex flasks and beakers, of Corning, N. Y.:

About the first of this year, after producing chemical wares some three or four years, we found our cost had practically doubled, and prices were raised about 25 per cent. Now we have to face Japanese competition. American universities are buying Japanese ware. The result will be to create in the generation of chemists now in school the same prejudice in favor of Japanese ware which has existed in the past in favor of German ware. We have reason to believe that Japan to-day, undisturbed by war as that country has been, can produce at a cost far below ours. We believe that Japan should not be allowed to obtain a foothold in this line. We can not cut prices to meet Japanese competition at this time, and we believe that a duty of 60 per cent ought to be imposed for the protection of this industry. It is not our intention to raise the price when such a duty is established. The desirability of having at home ample sources for chemical glassware in case of future wars is to-day obvious. England is understood to have been seriously embarrassed by lack of chemical glass supplies at the outbreak of the recent war.

I want to call attention to the statement by Dr. W. F. Hillebrand, chief chemist, Bureau of Standards. Dr. Hillebrand testified as follows:

Dr. HILLEBRAND. I think I can say that the director feels that the glass industry—and the porcelain industry, undoubtedly—has suffered by lack of protection. I do feel—and in fact I know that the Bureau of Standards feels—that the glass industry and the porcelain industry, which did not exist before the war, practically had suffered from lack of protection against foreign importation, and undoubtedly the imposition of a duty is going to help the domestic glass industry. That is beyond question.

I want to quote from the statement of Mr. Frank J. Sheridan, of the Tariff Commission, in response to a question asked by the Tariff Commission of the various colleges whether there would be any objection to a withdrawal of the duty-free clause. He stated as follows:

In response to question No. 1—would the withdrawal of the duty-free privilege heretofore enjoyed by educational institutions and the continuance of the present rate of duty on apparatus and chemicals increase the development and manufacture of such merchandise in the United States—elicited the following: The heads of the chemical departments of 20 universities and scientific institutions replied to this question. The institutions included Yale, Cornell, Pennsylvania, Leland Stanford, Illinois, Pittsburgh, Chicago, Washington and Lee, Ann Arbor, Washington, the Carnegie Institute, Rockefeller Institution, Bureau of Chemistry, Bureau of Standards, Washington Hygiene Laboratory, Geophysical Laboratory, and Pratt Institute. Of these, 17 stated that the withdrawal of the duty-free privilege would increase the development and manufacture of chemical articles, 1 said it would have little effect, 1 answered in the negative, and 1 was noncommittal.

I want to call attention to the fact that with this duty-free advantage which educational institutions have had they have not sold to their students their supplies at cost. Mr. Sheridan, of the Tariff Commission, in quoting from the manufacturer, states:

Some schools charge net prices, but the majority add from 100 to 200 per cent to the cost, which was not intended by the Government when the law was passed. In other words, a great many schools compel the students to pay the entire operating expenses of the laboratory supply department by adding a profit to the duty-free prices. One large western university pays interest on the equipment of the storeroom and the running expenses of same, including the salary of the purchasing agent, and shows a profit. We do not know of any that charge the actual cost price. The spirit and literal interpretation of the duty-free law has been broken by a great many schools in checking up the apparatus used by instructors and students in allowing the same to be carried away from the institution. Some of the duty-free goods have been disposed of by the laboratories.

I want to quote now from the testimony as given by Mr. William P. Clark, president American Flint Glass Workers' Union of North America. Mr. Clark in his statement states that there are 85,000 glass workers in the United States and about $250,000,000 invested in the enterprise and he goes on to state in reference to the 60 per cent ad valorem:

Mr. CLARK. This Japanese competition warrants us in asking for 60 and not 45 per cent ad valorem—and that will not meet the situation, although it will lessen the evil. That 45 per cent clause, which Mr. Sheridan spoke about, was suggested at a time when we did not have this Japanese competition in reality, and we felt that if the 45 per cent were placed on this ware, and you did not let it go to these laboratories and hospitals free, when from 42 to 53 per cent of it is used there—if that was to bear the tariff, in place of coming duty free, that would have relieved the situation, in so far as Germany, Austria, and Belgium were concerned; but we were reckoning then, in January, 1918, with Japan, with which we must reckon now. For that reason, we are anxious to have a clause in paragraph 573, in its application to this chemical glassware, annulled, and to make this ware subject to the regular tariff; and that tariff, we think, should be 60 per cent in place of 45 per cent.

I also desire to quote from the testimony of Mr. Charles L. Parsons, Washington, D. C., secretary of the American Chemical Society. And I want to call Members' attention particularly to the testimony of Mr. Parsons:

Mr. PARSONS. I am secretary of the American Chemical Society, sir, which has a membership of 13,500 of the chemists of our country.

Mr. COPLEY. Do you believe the chemical industry was exceedingly important in the successful prosecution of this war by the American people?

Mr. PARSONS. I am naturally prejudiced, but I think there was none more important.

Mr. COPLEY. And you think we successfully disproved the claim of Germany of the superiority of her chemical glassware in her prewar propaganda?

Mr. PARSONS. I know we did.

Mr. COPLEY. And you regard this industry as absolutely essential to the chemical independence of this country in the event of future wars?

Mr. PARSONS. I think there is no question about that. We have to have our gas warfare and all those things.

Now, here is something I think of vital interest to the Members of the House who are interested in this particular bill. Referring to the statement made by him, I asked him this question:

Mr. BACHARACH. In addition to the fact you want American-made goods for the reason they should be American-made goods; you want to prevent any further propaganda such as we had prior to the war?

Mr. PARSONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULL. Does your organization represent chemists of the universities?

Mr. PARSONS. Probably every chemical professor and most all of the chemical instructors in all the universities of America. I say probably; I know it; there is no question but that they are all members of the American Chemical Society. And in this organization large numbers of those were present and there was very little dissent among those present as to the desirability of this action.

Mr. COLLIER. You say those connected with these universities and colleges were there and approved of this proposition?

Mr. PARSONS. They were there and favored it; yes, sir. There were representatives from Cornell, Yale, the University of California, the University of Pennsylvania, Columbia University—I can get a list if it would be of any interest. But it is practically the most representative chemical organization that can be gotten together in America, composed of representatives elected by the local sections. We have 55 local sections in America, which are very largely controlled by the colleges and universities.

Mr. COLLIER. And I understood you to say, in answer to a question from Mr. Oldfield, this association is in no way, directly or indirectly, connected with the manufacture?

Mr. PARSONS. It is a scientific association which does not make a cent of money from any person, individual, firm, or corporation. It is only a scientific association, the same as the Association of Mechanical Engineers, the Association of Civil Engineers, etc. It is an association gotten together for the development of the chemical science and industry.

Mr. YOUNG. If I understood you correctly, your main purpose is to secure a dependable supply for all time to come in this country?

Mr. PARSONS. That is it, exactly.

We also have the testimony of quite a number of manufacturers. We have the testimony of Dr. Herty, who has charge of chemistry of the University of North Carolina, and Dr. Herty in his statement said that it did not make any difference, in his judgment, what the rate of duty should be, just so it would be high enough that the youth of this country were not compelled to use chemical and laboratory glassware made either in Germany or Japan. It was proven, so far as America is concerned, that her glassware is the equal of the German glassware and far superior to the Japanese glassware. I want to call attention to the fact that America can not compete with Japan.

Among all the witnesses who appeared before the committee there was evidenced a great feeling of pride in the accomplishments of American genius and American labor in these scientific industries.

The chemists, both those engaged in commercial lines and the professors in our universities, are proud of the fact that through the energies of American capital and labor their needs were supplied at a time when their country demanded the best of their genius; the manufacturers are proud in their realization that when war menaced our very existence their organizations were able to meet the most critical and trying demands of the Government; and the skilled workmen are deservedly proud of the fact that, like the skilled artisans in all other lines, when their country called upon them for its most essential needs, they were able to produce in kind and quantity scientific apparatus, utensils, and appliances which the scientists of America, by a most invidious propaganda, had been educated to believe could not be satisfactorily produced in the United States.

The accomplishments and achievements of the American manufacturer and the American skilled mechanic in these scientific industries are most remarkable and are deserving of the highest commendation. They have demonstrated to the world since the outbreak of the World War that we have once and for all acquired our independence of foreign countries in these industries.

National defense and our industrial independence require and demand that the manufacturing of chemical glassware and porcelain ware, optical glass, and other scientific instruments and apparatus, developed in America since the outbreak of war, shall be continued, and that the United States shall never again find itself, with respect to these industries, in the very humiliating and alarming situation in which we found ourselves, for want of these industries, in the early part of 1915.

With this end in view, those who are most vitally interested in the perpetuity of these industries come to you and ask for a reasonable protection against foreign competition which will enable these industries to continue in existence.

Are you going to reward the skilled mechanics of America, thousands of whom are engaged in these industries, for their devotion to their country and for their wonderful achievement in bringing about the industrial independence of America in these industries by affording to them that protection which will permit them to continue their employment at a fair wage?

Or are you going to force them out of employment and once again place America under the yoke of foreign domination in these essential and important industries by compelling American manufacturers to go out of business by forcing them to compete against the low paid and wily Jap and recently despised Hun?

I am showing here a nest of 13 beakers, made by the Whiteall Tatum Co., and its price to the trade of this Nation is $1.27½. Of course these beakers are all heat resisting. The chemical side is something I can not explain as it should be explained, except all of this glass has heat resistance and very great resistance, and after being placed to an exceedingly high temperature of heat these are placed in cold water, and they have to withstand that change. Here are the Japanese goods, which can be delivered inland, in a small town of New Jersey, for $1.01, with a duty of 45 per cent ad valorem on them. The glass people are only asking that that duty shall be increased from 45 to 60 per cent. The manufacturers have already stated if the duty is increased 45 to 60 per cent they are perfectly willing to go ahead and continue the manufacture of this chemical glassware. Not only are they interested from the fact that it was a patriotic movement during the war, but it has done more, probably, to help the laboring classes that are interested in the glass industry than any one thing that has occurred during the war.

I want to revert to the testimony before the committee given by Mr. Ralph Barber. Until the needs of our country for chemical glassware demanded that new factories be brought into being for the manufacture of this line of merchandise Mr. Barber was employed as a skilled mechanic.

In speaking of the efforts that had been made to develop the chemical glass industry in this country before the war, and of the concessions that had been made by the American Flint Glass Blowers Association in their desire to help the manufacturers to build up this industry by accepting longer hours of service at no increase in wages, in the hope that the industry could be maintained in this country, but without success, Mr. Barber made this very significant statement:

> All efforts, however, proved futile, so far as results were concerned; but the coming of the war gave us the opening that we had long sought for. The resultant difficulty in securing goods made it necessary to look to the American workingmen of their goods. I might say that I was possibly one of the few workmen who at that time felt that I had gotten the opportunity that I had long looked for—a chance to demonstrate to the American people that the American manufacturer and the American workingman could make glassware just as good and just as cheaply as could be made by anybody anywhere under the same rate of wages."

The point I wish to make in connection with Mr. Barber's statement is this, that to give encouragement to the American workmen when they deserve it is the surest remedy for the eradication of Bolshevism, I. W. W.'ism, and all other manner of social unrest.

We should encourage the youth of our country in doing things well, whether it be the product of hands or brains, pay them for their efforts and energies, supply a practical worthy ideal, and the spirit of discontent is gone.

By doing this, in place of discontent you have awakened the man to his responsibilities—a life of usefulness; you have made him a thing of worth to his fellow man. The world looks brighter to him; he is doing something useful, doing something worth while, making something his country needs.

All success consists in doing something for somebody, benefiting humanity; and the feeling of success comes from a consciousness of this. Interest the American youth in useful employment and you have sounded the death knell of anarchy.

This is one of the big things which the bill now before the House will help to accomplish, and for this and the other essential needs of the country, as I have endeavored to show them to you, I ask your support of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I understand, the Japanese wages are about 51 cents a day?

Mr. BACHARACH. The Japanese male wages are about 53 cents a day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What are the wages in America?

Mr. BACHARACH. A first-class skilled mechanic gets $6.60 a day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Japanese wages are one-twelfth of what our workmen get here?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes. And the Japanese workmen labor 12 hours a day and our workmen 8 hours a day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the idea is to meet the difference in the wages?

Mr. BACHARACH. And if the Japanese workmen would do as much work as our workmen we would have to have our duty way up in the hundred per cents.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Will the gentleman tell us whether the glassware in Japan is made by hand labor or whether the glass made in America is made by hand labor, or is it made by machine?

Mr. BACHARACH. I will say that most of the labor in Japan is by hand. A great deal of the glassware is manufactured not in large shops the same as we have in this country, but manufactured in small shops and in the homes. In this country we are manufacturing a great deal of this work not alone by hand, but a great deal of it also is manufactured by machine.

Mr. ACKERMAN. I wanted to know whether the difference between what can be laid down here for $1.01 by the Japanese compared with $1.27½ for that made in America is precisely in the same ratio as Japanese efficiency compared with American efficiency?

Mr. BACHARACH. With the beakers exactly the same.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is not the gentleman's colleague from New Jersey also referring to the comparison of quality as between the manufactures?

Mr. BACHARACH. He did not ask me anything about the quality.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think that is what he had in mind.

Mr. BACHARACH. So far as we can ascertain, the American goods are superior in quality to the Japanese goods.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BACHARACH. Can I have two more minutes?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield two more minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. BACHARACH. I want to call attention of the committee to some of the glassware made in this country. Of course, none of it was made here prior to the war. I want to quote the prices. This [illustrating] is a sulphur apparatus, and the price of it in Vineland is 90 cents, and the Japanese cost to the college would be 58, and including the ad valorem duty is 85 cents on the Japanese article. This is a construction apparatus used principally in making food analyses. This is made by the Kimball Glass Co. The price of it in this country is $4.50, the selling price. It cost from $3.50 to $3.75 to manufacture it, and $2 of that amount goes to the man that manufactures it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that I have this day filed a petition, signed by 6,500,000 citizens of the United States, indorsing the proposition of six months' pay for soldiers. This petition was circulated by the Hearst newspapers throughout the United States, and these signatures were acquired in a few days. Several carloads of these petitions arrived in the Capitol to-day and were delivered to the Clerk of the House.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not now. This is substantial evidence that the people of the United States are in favor of giving the soldiers, besides the button we have given them, something more substantial for their services during the great world war.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman has no time to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOORE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to speak a few words in favor of this bill, chiefly because there are a number of manufacturing industries and workmen in the fifteenth Ohio district that are greatly interested in its passage.

The author of the bill has very well explained the necessity for the legislation, and I am sure that the Committee on Ways and Means has carefully conducted investigations which have led to this legislation, although some of the manufacturers express a well-founded fear that the proposed protection will not be sufficient.

As I recall the history of it, as far back as 1790 a great many of our institutions of learning began receiving their laboratory porcelain and laboratory glassware from Germany and Austria free of duty, and have been since so receiving it. This has resulted in the fact that practically all of our laboratory glassware and porcelain came from these countries, which made our institutions of learning and those who studied therein feel that these could not be produced in this country. I am sure now that our splendid and heroic young men who come back from the great World War and again enter our institutions of learning and our industrial plants will not care to have before them an equipment manufactured in some foreign land, but they will be glad to know that the equipment with which they work was made in our own country [applause] by our own skilled and efficient workmen.

For years we bought these products from Germany, and when the time came that we needed them in our industries and educational institutions, and there was a blockade on account of the war, we did not have them in America. But American initiative, American ingenuity, American constructive skill, American wealth, and American labor were all joined together by the employee and the employer to see that we produced the things that we needed in this country in a time when we were called upon to participate in the great World War.

We have learned many lessons from the war. I think we should observe this, that Germany tried to be independent, so that when the war broke out she had many things that she needed, and did not depend on other countries. But we had this lesson, that these things that we needed in our munition plants to make investigations and to carry on our work in our laboratories we did not possess. If this bill should be passed we shall encourage these industries and provide against an embarrassing situation. In fact, if the bill does not pass these industries must suffer, indeed likely cease to exist, because, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] has suggested, our workmen can not compete economically with foreign laborers who receive only about one-tenth or one-twelfth as much as our workmen receive.

Three splendid industries, at least, and there may be others, in the district which I have the honor to represent, are interested in this bill. The Cambridge Glass Co., of Cambridge, has been producing laboratory glassware. The Ohio Pottery Co., at Zanesville, and the Guernsey Earthenware Co., at Cambridge, have been manufacturing laboratory porcelain. The men behind these industries have put their funds into the work, and the men in the factories have learned the trade and applied their skill. These men, both the manufacturers and the workmen, came to the aid of the Government when the Government needed these products. It is now the duty of those of us who represent the Government to protect them when they need the protection.

There is a real danger of destroying these industries if we do not immediately provide adequate protection, for both Japan and Germany have these products ready to place in our markets. I think that unquestionably this bill should pass. The institutions of learning that have been receiving these goods duty free, as has been stated here, will be very glad to see that we make that which the youth of our land use in our institutions of learning and in our great industrial plants and to observe that these things are made in America; not made by cheap foreign labor and child labor, but made in our own industries, with our own money and with our own hands. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7785) to provide revenue for the Government, to establish and maintain in the United States manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, optical glass, scientific and surgical instruments, and laboratory apparatus, had come to no resolution thereon.

ZINC.

Mr. FORDNEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. 6238) to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the production of zinc ores and manufactures thereof in the United States, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

RECESS RESCINDED.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 26.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the action taken under concurrent resolution of July 28, 1919, providing for an adjournment of the House from Saturday, the 2d day of August, until 12 o'clock meridian, Tuesday, the 9th day of September, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. McARTHUR. Regular order!

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on this resolution.

Mr. McARTHUR. I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas presents a privileged report from the Committee on Rules. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider House concurrent resolution No. 26, a resolution rescinding the action of the House heretofore taken providing for an adjournment from August 2, 1919, until September 9, 1919. Said resolution shall be considered under the general rules of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. My point of order against this resolution is that it is out of order, for the reason that this House last Monday, by an almost unanimous vote, at least without a call for a division—and I take it that that means it was practically unanimous—passed a resolution providing that when this House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet on the 9th day of September. A motion was made to reconsider the vote by which that motion was passed and to lay that on the table, and the latter motion was agreed to, which made such action of the House final. The membership of the House, acting upon the record made then, took it for granted that the House meant what it said when it agreed that it would adjourn to-morrow to meet on the 9th day of September, and at least 100 Members have gone to their homes, scattered over the United States. At least 200 other Members have bought their transportation home. It is not fair to them. What is the emergency? Another threat from the four great railroad brotherhoods of a nation-wide strike on September 1. Another holdup, if you please. And the people are paying the bills.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. I take it it is beyond the province of the Rules Committee to go behind the action of the House thus taken. We have become regular jumping jacks for demands for increase of salaries. If we want to decrease the high cost of living, we must begin by using some reasonable economy in running the affairs of our Government.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it has been well settled by precedent that the Committee on Rules have authority to bring in this resolution. In fact, if the Chair is not mistaken, it has been done in a case exactly similar to this. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is in accordance with the precedents of the House, and brings before the House a resolution to enable the House to express its will in a resolution rescinding the action heretofore taken by the House providing for a recess. It is a matter that the House has a perfect right to do under the precedents. The resolution presented by the Committee on Rules makes the rescinding resolution in order under the rules of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman intend, before moving the previous question, to present an explanation as to why this rule is necessary?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is necessary because of the objection of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. And I objected because this is based upon a move by railroad employees to again raid the Treasury, and made because of the railroad brotherhoods in this country trying to hold up the people of the country again for about the seventh time. There is the real reason. First the Adamson law, forced by threats, then an annual increase in wages from Director McAdoo of $760,000,000, then an additional annual increase from Director Hines of $67,500,000, and now upon threats to tie up all railroads in a nation-wide strike September 1 Congress must either truckle or fight. For one I am in favor of a show-down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not break in upon the debate without addressing the Chair and being recognized either by the Chair or by the gentleman who has control of the time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's intention to state to the House why it is necessary to consider the proposition to rescind the resolution providing for a recess?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a matter that will be discussed, no doubt, by the gentleman who presented the rescinding resolution. The resolution that I have presented from the Committee on Rules merely makes the rescinding resolution in order at this time.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the gentleman think that in order to enable the Members of the House to vote intelligently even upon the rule, which is a very extraordinary rule, there should be read in the gentleman's time and before he moves the previous question the letters that are the occasion for this extraordinary procedure?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The letter from the President is a short letter, but the letter to which the President refers would consume 20 minutes in the reading.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I had already yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. It seems to me, if I may suggest it to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]—and of course the gentleman understands that I am in favor of the rule—that it might be just as well to present the matter now as to reserve it and present it on the concurrent resolution. If we had obtained unanimous consent that would have been different.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming—how much time?

Mr. MONDELL. Five minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I presented is predicated on certain communications received by the Speaker and Members of the House from the President of the United States. The letter to the Speaker of the House I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 1 August, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The Director General of Railroads informs me that the situation with reference to the railroads is growing so critical every hour that I hope it will be possible for the House to postpone its recess until some definite action is taken upon the recommendations contained in my letter to Mr. ESCH. Officials of the Government have been in consultation with reference to the problems growing out of the high cost of living, upon which I expect recommendations to be made within a fortnight. I sincerely trust that the proposed recess of Congress may be postponed at least until such time as we may know definitely the problems which confront us, growing out of this intricate situation.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
Speaker, House of Representatives.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor to receive a letter identical with that addressed to the Speaker and just read. The letter addressed to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 1 August, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. ESCH: I take the liberty of inclosing a copy of a letter which I have just received from Mr. Walker D. Hines, the Director General of Railroads, and which I am sure you will agree with me in thinking contains matter for very serious thought and for action also.

May I not say that I concur in the suggestions which Mr. Hines makes in the two concluding paragraphs of his letter? I hope that it will be possible for your committee to consider and recommend legislation which will provide a body of the proper constitution, authorized to investigate and determine all questions concerning the wages of railway employees, and which will also make the decisions of that body mandatory upon the rate-making body and provide, when necessary, increased rates to cover any recommended increases in wages and, therefore, in the cost of operating the railroads. In view also of the indisputable facts with regard to the increased cost of living, I concur in Mr. Hines's suggestion that the legislation undertaken should authorize the body thus set up to make its findings with regard to wage increases retroactive to the 1st of August, 1919, at any rate to the extent that that tribunal may regard reasonable and proper, in order to give real relief to the employees concerned.

I need not, I am sure, urge upon you the importance of this matter, which seems vital from more than one point of view, and I hope that you will think this form of action the proper and necessary one.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. JOHN J. ESCH,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, when the House, after careful consideration of all matters involved, agreed upon the recess of five weeks it was with the view and expectation that all pending matters of legislation of importance would be advanced by the recess, because of the fact that the recess would afford an opportunity for the committees to continue uninterruptedly in the consideration of matters before them.

This was particularly true with regard to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which is now considering and proposed to continue to consider during the recess all of the questions involved in and related to the railway problems of the country, and including, of course, the very questions now suggested and presented by the President.

These and other matters of reconstruction would have been carefully and thoroughly considered by this committee and the other committees, and I am still of the opinion that their careful and wise consideration and settlement by the committees would have been advanced by the recess.

The President, however, presents an added reason for the continuation of the House in session; that is, the consideration of the problems growing out of the high cost of living. These are tremendously important questions. They would have received consideration and attention by the committees which remained in session during the recess, but the President suggests that he may be able to make recommendations to the Congress on this all-important subject within a fortnight. We certainly can not afford to miss any possible opportunity to consider and pass upon any suggestions or recommendations that shall promise relief from the present intolerable conditions.

In view of these facts, and in the hope that the President may be able to make recommendations to the Congress containing practical suggestions of means for the reduction of the high cost of living, I feel it is the duty of the House to remain in session. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 135, noes 1.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 235, nays 4, answered "present" 6, not voting 184, as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Mr. FESS with Mr. HUMPHREYS.

Mr. WOODYARD with Mr. FERRIS.

Mr. BOIES with Mr. DAVEY.

Mr. COPLEY with Mr. BELL.

Mr. BROWNING with Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. KAHN with Mr. BOOHER.

Mr. RHODES with Mr. PHELAN.

Mr. RIDDICK with Mr. SIMS.

Mr. SINCLAIR with Mr. STEDMAN.

Mr. STEENERSON with Mr. MOORE of Virginia.

Mr. TOWNER with Mr. OLIVER.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the resolution speaks for itself. The President's letters and the brief statement I have made presents the matter fully to the House. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 26.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the action taken under concurrent resolution of July 28, 1919, providing for an adjournment of the House from Saturday, the 2d day of August, until 12 o'clock meridian, the 9th day of September, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not think any further debate or discussion is necessary, and therefore I move the previous question.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is not going to give an opportunity for any debate?

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, is this a concurrent resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is a concurrent resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not know whether it was a joint or concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent,

Mr. ROBERT E. EVANS was granted leave of absence for an indefinite term on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. MOON was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of important business.

Mr. DRANE was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of important business.

Mr. HULINGS was granted extended leave of absence for two days on account of illness in family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks on the resolution offered awhile ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request on the resolution just passed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen do not have to get consent to revise their remarks. If they want to extend them, they have to get consent to do it. They have the privilege of revising and correcting errors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of the letter from Walker D. Hines, Director General of the Railway Administration, to the President of the United States, referred to in the President's letter to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of a letter from Mr. Hines to the President, referred to in the letter to Mr. ESCH. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

JULY 31, 1919.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Several months ago the railroad shop employees asked for an increase in wages. The matter was considered by the Railroad Administration's Board of Wages and Working Conditions, which is composed of three representatives of labor and three representatives of the railroad managements. This board was unable to agree and therefore took no action as a board, but on July 16 I received two reports from members of the board, one from the three labor members recommending a general increase in wages (for example increasing the wages of machinists from 68 cents per hour to 80 cents per hour and proportionately increasing the wages of other classes of shop employees), and another report from the three management members recommending against any general increase in wages, although recommending certain readjustments of the wages of some classes of the employees.

The position of the labor members of the board is that the wages of railroad shopmen are substantially below the wages paid similar classes of employees in the navy yards, arsenals, and shipyards, and in many industrial enterprises in the principal cities of the country, and that substantial increases in the wages in the shipyards and outside industrial enterprises have taken place since the wages of the shop employees were established in the summer of 1918, and that the cost of living has been, and is, steadily rising. The position of the management members on the board is that the wages of shop employees are not properly comparable with the wages of nonrailroad employees cited by the employees and their representatives and that these latter industries have differentiating conditions which account for the high wages paid by them, and that a further wage increase at this time would simply begin a new cycle in the increased cost of living which would not benefit the employees. They urge instead, the adoption of effective methods of reducing the cost of living; but they add that unless some action can be taken within a reasonable time to accomplish this result they see no alternative but to continue the wage cycle increases with corresponding increased cycles of living costs.

On July 28 a conference was begun in accordance with an arrangement made on July 8 between the representatives of the Railroad Administration and representatives of the shop employees. At this conference the representatives of the employees made it plain to my associates that their members expected, and believed that they were entitled to, a substantial increase in wages retroactive to January 1, 1919, and that the state of unrest was so great that it was of the highest importance that a definite answer be given on the wage matter without delay. These representatives expressed the same views to me yesterday.

On July 17 the Shop Crafts Convention, meeting at Atlanta, Ga., and representing employees from 16 railroads in the Southeast, strongly urged the necessity for substantial increases in wages by August 1, retroactive to January 1, 1919.

The earnest insistence that immediate action be taken to equalize wages with the rapid increase in the cost of living is not confined to the shop employees.

The triennial convention of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, representing about 160,000 railroad employees, meeting at Columbus, Ohio, adopted on May 31 a resolution strongly urging substantial additional increases in wages, to meet the cost of living.

The triennial convention of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, meeting at Denver from June 9 to July 15, and representing about 116,000 employees, likewise adopted resolutions insisting upon the necessity for substantial increases in wages, to meet the increased cost of living.

The thirteenth annual convention of Railway Signalmen of America, in session at Kansas City on July 15, strongly urged a further increase in wages, and similar action was taken at Boston on July 27 by 150 delegates to the convention of the United Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees and Railroad Shop Employees of the railroad systems of New England and New York. The international convention of the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, which was held in Cincinnati from May 12 to 24, indorsed proposals to the Railroad Administration, which also urged an increase and readjustment of the wages of the employees represented by that organization.

The representatives of the Railroad Administration have had assurances from representatives of practically all classes of employees that the continuance in the increase in the cost of living would necessarily involve very substantial increases in wages, and that increases in wages given to any one class of railroad employees would necessitate corresponding increases to all other classes of railroad employees.

The situation thus presented involves the following considerations:

We have received the most positive assurances that any general increases to shop employees will result in demands for corresponding increases to every other class of railroad employees. The situation therefore can not be viewed except as a whole for the entire 2,000,000 railroad employees. Viewing it as a whole, every increase of 1 cent per hour means an increase of $50,000,000 per year in operating expenses for straight time, with a substantial addition for necessary overtime. An increase of 12 cents per hour, as asked for by the shop employees, would, if applied to all employees, mean (including necessary overtime) an increase of probably $800,000,000 per year in operating expenses.

The Government is already incurring a deficit at the rate of several hundred million dollars per year in operating the railroads, because the increase in transportation rates has been proportionately less than the increases in wages already granted and the increases in prices which have taken place. Therefore there is no fund whatever out of which additional wages can be paid, so that additional wages can not be paid unless new revenues are produced through an increase in transportation rates, and immediate payment of additional wages would necessitate for several months an appropriation by Congress out of the Treasury, because substantial increases in rates could not be made immediately effective.

While you may find it expedient to use the temporary rate-making power which was conferred upon you as a war emergency during Federal control to prevent the continuance of the deficit now being incurred which grows out of increases in wages and prices due to the war, you would not, in my opinion, be justified in regarding that rate-making power as a sufficient warrant for making still additional increases in rates for the purpose of paying still additional increases in wages to be established under existing peace conditions and to be controlling as the wage basis in the future.

The question presented for an additional increase in wages, whether the total amount be $800,000,000 or any proportion of that sum, is a peace-time question between the entire American public on the one hand and the 2,000,000 railroad employees and the members of their families on the other hand. It is a question which I do not believe the Executive ought to undertake to decide unless specific authority is conferred upon him for the express purpose of deciding it.

The fact that these demands are made and are so urgently pressed emphasizes the great necessity of having for their decision legislation which will provide adequate machinery representing both the public and the employees. Obviously, any such machinery should include a method whereby revenues will be provided to the extent required to pay the increased wages awarded.

While the general powers implied in the Federal-control act were sufficient to admit of taking as war measures the necessary steps to deal with the wage problems that arose during the war, they are not sufficient to satisfy the requirements arising in connection with any present proposals for general wage increases. Under the existing machinery the ultimate public interest is exclusively represented by the Railroad Administration in the making of wages but by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the final decision upon rates. Moreover, the Railroad Administration, while thus charged with the final decision as to what wages are proper as between the American public and railroad labor, is also charged with the responsibilities incident to the day-to-day operation of the railroads. On the one hand, a decision by the Railroad Administration against an increase in wages will be regarded by the employees as a decision dictated more by the immediate difficulties of railroad management than by the broad interests of the public as a whole. On the other hand, a decision by the Railroad Administration in favor of an increase in wages will not necessarily be binding on the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is now the final representative of the public as to transportation rates. To deal with these problems under peace-time conditions there ought to be a final and authoritative representation of the public, whose decision when in favor of a wage increase would carry with it the obligation on the part of the final rate-making power to prescribe rates which would furnish the necessary funds with which to pay the increased wages. It is obvious that no wage increases could be put into effect at the moment except on the theory that for several months they would be paid by an appropriation of Congress, because even under the existing machinery rate increases could not actually be put into effect for a substantial period. Undoubtedly any rate increases of a general character ought at the present time to be considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission before they shall be put into effect.

The conclusion to which I have come has been forced upon me by the recent developments above referred to.

When I announced last March the increases in wages for the employees in train and engine service, I stated that they completed the war cycle of wage increases.

When it developed in May and June that the continued pressure of the increase in the cost of living was causing railroad employees generally to urge that they be given substantial protection through further important increases in wages if the cost of living was not reduced, I realized that the question was assuming such wide and deep significance to the American public as well as to railroad employees that the question ought not to be dealt with in the same way in which the railroad wages had been increased in connection with the war emergency. I therefore advised the board of railroad wages and working conditions on July 3 that they could not regard themselves as vested with jurisdiction to formulate and recommend further general wage increases to be made by me, but that in all cases thereafter arising they should report the facts to me, that I might decide, in the light of the facts upon a fair and just procedure.

The receipt of the observations of the members of the board with reference to the shop employees, the hearings now in progress before the board with reference to the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, the conferences I have had in the last three days with the representatives of the shop employees and the conferences which my associates and I have been having recently with the representatives of practically all classes of railroad labor with reference to the menace in the continued increase in the cost of living, force me to the definite conclusion that the problem is too great and has too much permanent significance to the American public as well as to railroad labor to admit of its being decided through the exercise of the war emergency powers of the Federal control act and which are subject to the limitations and embarrassments above pointed out. I feel that the developments have now reached the point where the situation has taken a sufficiently concrete form to serve as the basis for a positive recommendation.

I therefore respectfully recommend that Congress be asked promptly to adopt legislation providing a properly constituted body on which the public and labor will be adequately represented and which will be empowered to pass on these and all railroad wage problems, but not on rules and working conditions (because the latter can not be satisfactorily separated from the current handling of railroad operations and therefore should continue to be dealt with by the Railroad Administration). Such legislation should also provide that if wage increases shall be decided upon it shall be mandatory upon the rate-making body to provide where necessary increased rates to take care of the resulting increases in the cost of operating the railroads.

I do not think that we can properly deal with this great problem without a full recognition of the fact that the cost of living is rapidly rising and that every month that passes promises to impair still further the purchasing power of the existing wages of railroad employees unless the rise in the cost of living can be successfully restrained (as I earnestly hope in the general public interest it can speedily be). I therefore further recommend that Congress be asked to provide in any such legislation that any increases in railroad wages which may be made by the tribunal constituted for that purpose shall be made effective as of August 1, 1919, to such an extent as that tribunal may regard reasonable and proper in order to give railroad employees from that date the benefit which the tribunal may think they were then entitled to. In this way the delay necessarily incident to the creation of such tribunal and its action will not be prejudicial to the fair interests of the railroad employees.

Cordially, yours,

WALKER D. HINES.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope that to-morrow it may be possible to have some arrangement made whereby the Members of the House can be absent from the city for perhaps the next two weeks through adjournments for three days at a time.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I hope not.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I have been requested by a great many Members to make that suggestion as a matter that would be taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the gentleman from Wyoming ought to make that request now. [Applause.] I will give the reason for it. More than two-thirds of the Members in the House have made their arrangements to leave here to-morrow night and have bought their tickets. Now, there are about half of them that are close enough to use tickets and go home and be back here, and if the gentleman would make the request for this three-day adjournment scheme, with the addendum that if they are needed here sooner than the end of the two weeks, the Clerk of the House or the Sergeant at Arms, or the majority and minority leaders, will telegraph them to come back, it would be a great accommodation to a large number of Members. I have all my tickets, but I am not going to try to use them. I am going to stay here and help out.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not make the request, because I did not expect it would be acceded to. I knew that there are several gentlemen who would be pretty likely to object. I think that the gentlemen who have their tickets bought and feel they ought to go home for a few days and must go, could go with a reasonable assurance that by to-morrow we could have the matter of short recesses for a time more fully discussed and arrive at a unanimous agreement relative to it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will give the gentleman from Wyoming this piece of information, that the "great objector" in the House wants to go home to-night himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask who is the "great objector" that the gentleman from Missouri refers to?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I thought possibly the gentleman from Missouri would disclose it if asked to do so.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I feel very confident that we can secure an agreement to-morrow under which gentlemen that feel they must go home for a few days will be perfectly safe in doing so, even in leaving to-night, but from statements that gentlemen have made to me I do not feel disposed to make a request for a brief period of recesses this evening. And, further, I think it would be better to wait until to-morrow and have time to consider the matter before determining what we should do.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6805. An act to authorize the county of Dougherty, State of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Flint River, connecting Broad Street, in the city of Albany, said State and county, with the Isabella Road, said county and State;

H. R. 5228. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Minneapolis, a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River;

H. R. 2847. An act providing additional aid for the American Printing House for the Blind;

H. R. 5418. An act increasing the pay of printers and pressmen employed in the Government Printing Office, and for other purposes;

H. R. 6434. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River, about 2 miles above its confluence with the Washita River, near Preston, Grayson County, Tex.;

H. R. 6450. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department, approved September 2, 1914,' as amended";

H. R. 6342. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, at the town of Usk, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 5648. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Rainy River, between Spooner, Minn., and Rainy River, Province of Ontario, Canada;

H. R. 6438. An act authorizing the counties of Aiken, S. C., and Richmond, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River, at or near Augusta, Ga.; and

H. R. 6692. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the White River, at or near Forsyth, Mo.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, August 2, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting communication from the Secretary of Agriculture submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Department of Agriculture for preventing the spread of the European corn borer, fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 171); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting list of useless documents and papers and recommending that authority be granted to dispose of them (H. Doc. No. 172); to the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting reports from Army officials showing the interest of the soldiers in the plan now before Congress to provide them with farms on the unused lands of the country (H. Doc. No. 173); to the Committee on the Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska: Petition of 148 citizens of York County, Nebr., urging Congress not to adopt any form of universal military training; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MORIN: Petition of Local Union No. 131, Journeymen Tailors' Union of America, Pittsburgh, Pa., expressing its disapproval of war-time prohibition and urging that the present mild beer of 2¾ per cent alcohol should be exempt from the provisions of the eighteenth amendment, and also from the war-time prohibition measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin: Petition of common council of Milwaukee, Wis., relative to high cost of living; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NEELY: Petition of Civil War veterans, of Cameron, W. Va., requesting increase in pensions; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NOLAN: Petition of United States League of Local Building and Loan Associations at their convention, at Detroit, Mich., July 24, 1919, favoring the passage of House bill 6371; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. O'CONNELL: Petition of Chicago Clearing House Association opposing the Kenyon bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of Farmers' National Congress favoring passage of House bill 7348; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Refactories Traffic Association of the St. Louis district urging support of the Poindexter bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ROWAN: Petition of Refactories Traffic Association, of St. Louis district, urging support of the Poindexter bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Chicago Clearing House Association, opposing the Kenyon bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. TINKHAM: Petition of delegates of the Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paperhangers of America, urging legislation to better working conditions for employees at the navy yards of the United States; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, petition of District Grand Lodge of New England, Knights of Pythias, of the Eastern and Western Hemispheres, colored, urging legislation to protect and guarantee fair play to the colored race; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. YATES: Petition of National Civil Liberties Bureau, by Albert De Silver, director, New York, urging consideration of resolutions adopted by the American Federation of Labor; the National Woman's Trade Union League; and the Workers' Defense Union, protesting against Senate bill 1686 and House bill 6545, or any other peace-time legislation punishing sedition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Hon. Frank O. Lowden, Governor of Illinois, calling attention to communication received by him from Dr. S. A. Forbes, State entomologist, concerning the enormous damages by the insect known as the European corn borer; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of National Foreign Trade Council, by O. K. Davis, secretary, urging negotiation of a parcel post to Cuba and to that end in removal of Treasury regulation now preventing the importation of cigars in certain lots; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of A. J. Baldwin, care McGraw-Hill Co., New York, urging retention of zone postal rates; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of Committee on Uniform Judicial Procedure of the American Bar Association, by Eugene L. Garey, lawyer, Chicago, urging passage of Senate bill 1214 authorizing the Supreme Court of the United States to make rules governing the procedure in cases at law to the same extent that it already has power to regulate the procedure of equity, admiralty, and bankruptcy; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., by Milton H. Smith, president, Louisville, Ky., protesting against any such legislation as Senate bill 5679 introduced March 3, 1919, because such bill empowers wire companies to encumber in perpetuity the properties of railroads by appropriating rights of way; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 2, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast given to us our life. In this brief span of human experience Thou dost call us with the stern and solemn demands of stewardship to answer to Thee for the acts of our lives. It is but a step between time and eternity. We are moving on to the unfolding of the divine plan that reaches out into the never-ending world. All the solemn responsibilities of life together press upon us. Grant us this day to live in the light of the eternal issues. By the grace of God may we measure up to the duties of the day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7500) to protect the coastwise trade of the United States, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution rescinding the action taken under concurrent resolution of July 28, 1919, providing for the adjournment of the House from Saturday, the 2d day of August, until Tuesday, the 9th day of September, 1919, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 2847. An act providing additional aid for the American Printing House for the Blind;

H. R. 5228. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Minneapolis, a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River;

H. R. 5418. An act increasing the pay of printers and pressmen employed in the Government Printing Office, and for other purposes;

H. R. 5648. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Rainy River between Spooner, Minn., and Rainy River, Province of Ontario, Canada;

H. R. 6342. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River at the town of Usk, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 6434. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River about 2 miles above its confluence with the Washita River, near Preston, Grayson County, Tex.;

H. R. 6438. An act authorizing the counties of Aiken, S. C., and Richmond, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Augusta, Ga.;

H. R. 6450. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department, approved September 2, 1914,' as amended";

H. R. 6692. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the White River at or near Forsyth, Mo.; and

H. R. 6805. An act to authorize the county of Dougherty, State of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Flint River connecting Broad Street, in the city of Albany, said State and county, with the Isabella Road, said county and State.

HOUSE RECESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the action taken under concurrent resolution of July 28, 1919, providing for an adjournment of the House from Saturday, the 2d day of August, until 12 o'clock meridian, Tuesday, the 9th day of September, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House.

The resolution was concurred in.

AGRARIAN LAW OF STATE OF SONORA, MEXICO.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have just received what purports to be a copy of what is known as the agrarian law passed by the State of Sonora under the powers given in the peculiar new constitution of that Republic. Inasmuch as it is a matter of intense interest not only here but probably to the State Department itself, as I know of no other copy, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"AGRARIAN LAW.

"Plucarco Elias Calles, constitutional governor of the free and sovereign State of Sonora, to its inhabitants, makes known:

"That the honorable congress of the State has addressed me the following:

"No. 81.

"The congress of the State of Sonora, in the name of the people, decrees the following:

"Agrarian law.

"CHAPTER 1.

"General basis.

"ARTICLE 1. The object of this law is to create and foment small properties within the State.

"ART. 2. For the effects of this law, the following are considered of public utility:

"I. The dividing into fractions of large private land holdings;

"II. The forming of new agricultural centers with the land and waters which are indispensable to them;

"III. The utilization of waters in order to equitably distribute and apply them toward the cultivation of lands; and

"IV. Anything else which goes toward obtaining the objects enumerated in the preceding article.

"ART. 3. All inhabitants of the State who have the requirements which are specified further on will have the right of acquiring a parcel of land in accordance with the prescriptions of this law.

"ART. 4. The parcels of land referred to in the preceding article will be taken from private properties or from those which, by any reason, the State may have at its disposal.

"ART. 5. Privately owned lands which should be divided into fractions will be divided up by their owners in accordance with this law, but should they not make this division or oppose to its being made, the State, after expropriating same, for the sake of public utility will make the division.

"ART. 6. The expropriation proceedings will be enacted in accordance with the dispositions of the law relative thereto, excepting as regards that which refers to payment, which will be made in accordance with the dispositions of this law.

"CHAPTER 2.

"Agrarian officers.

"ART. 7. The proceedings which refer to matters relative to this law will be handled by the agrarian department of the State, subject to the executive power, and will be in charge of an engineer, having in his charge an office force as provided by the budget.

"CHAPTER 3.

"Classification of lands.

"ART. 8. For the effects of this law lands will be classified in the following manner:

"I. Agricultural lands.

"II. Grazing lands.

"ART. 9. By agricultural lands should be understood those which when asked for are under cultivation or which will be susceptible to immediate cultivation.

"ART. 10. By grazing lands should be understood those which when asked for are not cultivable, due to the nature of the land and which, being susceptible to cultivation, require, therefore, special primary works of irrigation, protection, or breaking up of the ground.

"ART. 11. Agricultural lands, in turn, will be subdivided into—

"I. Irrigation lands.

"II. Lands cultivable during the rainy season. (Temporal.)

"ART. 12. Irrigation lands are those which when asked for have the necessary water to assure at least one harvest per farming year.

"ART. 13. Lands cultivable during the rainy season are those which depend exclusively upon rainfall for their cultivation.

"CHAPTER 4.

"Regarding the maximum area of land which may be owned.

"ART. 14. The maximum area of land which may be owned by one person or legally constituted corporation is as follows: Fifty hectares in lands or private ownership located within the zone which was primarily surveyed as common land within town limits. (Ejidos.)

"Outside of the zone previously defined, the maximum area will be as follows:

"A. In irrigable farming land, 100 hectares.

"B. In agricultural land susceptible to irrigation during the rainy season, 300 hectares.

"C. In grazing lands, 10,000 hectares.

"ART. 15. The areas specified in the preceding article include the areas of one or more lots belonging to the same owner, whether they are adjoining one another or separated one from another or located in one or more municipalities.

"ART. 16. Persons or corporations which, in accordance with the law, have a right to possess lands may possess grazing, irrigable, or lands susceptible to irrigation during the rainy season at the same time, provided each class of land does not exceed the areas specified in article 14.

"ART. 17. When an owner of land susceptible to irrigation during the rainy reason, the area of which does not exceed the size specified for lands of this class, succeeds in making it irrigable land he may continue to own same in its totality.

"ART. 18. Grazing lands within the maximum area which may be asked for for cultivation purposes will be divided up in accordance with the stipulations of this law relative to agricultural lands.

"ART. 19. When the owner of grazing land, the area of which does not exceed the size specified by this law for this class of land, succeeds in converting it wholly or in part into agricultural land he may continue to possess it in its totality.

"CHAPTER 5.

"Regarding the division of lands.

"ART. 20. All properties which exceed the areas specified in article 14 and which belong to a sole owner or to a legally organized company will be considered as a large landed estate and the owner of same will be obliged, for the sake of public interest, to divide the excess amount of area within the time limit stipulated by this law.

"ART. 21. On and after the date of the promulgation of this law, owners of large landed estates within the State will advise the agrarian department of the preparatory operations of division they have made and will send in legalized copies of the respective contracts entered into.

"ART. 22. A period of 10 months, commencing on the date of the promulgation of this law, is given to property owners within which to make the divisions spoken of in the preceding articles.

"ART. 23. When the time limit to which the preceding article refers has elapsed, the areas of land in excess which belong to a sole owner or to a legally organized company will be divided up by the Government of the State, in accordance with Fractions VII and the respective subfractions of article 27 of the general constitution of the Republic and the law of expropriation for the sake of public utility of the State.

"ART. 24. The governor of the State will call together, by means of permanent notices in the "Boletin Oficial" (official Government paper) or by any other means of publicity, all persons who wish to acquire lots in the land which is to be divided up, setting forth conditions of purchase, etc., and when sufficient applications have been received he will proceed with the expropriation.

"ART. 25. For the effects of the preceding article, sufficient requests will be considered received when they reach 10 in number or when without reaching this number they cover an area of 50 hectares. In case the area to be expropriated does not exceed 50 hectares, it will suffice that the applications which are presented cover 50 per cent of said area.

"ART. 26. When a property is divided up the owner will have the right of choosing the portion of land which most suits him, provided it does not exceed the size specified in this law.

"ART. 27. The expropriation of lands made by the executive of the State, when enforcing this law, will be limited to the areas being requested.

"ART. 28. Lands which become property of the State through the exercise of economic coactive right will be turned over to applicants in legal form.

"CHAPTER 6.

"Regarding requests and adjudications.

"ART. 29. The maximum area to be granted will be the following:

"A. Of irrigable lands, 15 hectares.

"B. Of land susceptible to cultivation during the rainy season, 50 hectares.

"C. Of grazing lands, 1,250 hectares.

"Only in exceptional cases and when the applicants have sufficient means, within legal terms, to construct primary works of irrigation, protection, and breaking up of the ground, may the Executive grant as a maximum 100 hectares of irrigable land and 2,500 hectares for grazing purposes, provided the applicant has sufficient means to develop the land and better his live stock.

"ART. 30. Applicants for lands will address themselves in writing to the governor of the State and will state:

"I. Their name and surname, profession or occupation, address, nationality, civil status, and age;

"II. The amount of hectares which are desired and the class of land;

"III. Location of the lot or lots applied for and other data relative to location, expressing the name of the land and of the owner; and

"IV. The number of his dependents, if any, advising the sex and age of the members who compose his family.

"ART. 31. Applicants will substantiate in accordance with the respective regulations the following:

"I. That they have the draft animals and means for the cultivation of the agricultural lands requested, or, if they have not, that they have the necessary money to purchase them;

"II. To have at least 15 head of cattle and 30 sheep, or, if they do not have these, that they have sufficient capital to purchase them in order to make use of the grazing land requested; and

"III. That they substantiate what is expressed in fraction IV of the preceding article—that they are not landowners, and if they are, that they should state the area of the lot or lots, their class, location, and other data relative thereto.

"ART. 32. When there are various applicants for the same parcel of land, preference will be given as follows:

"I. To Mexicans who have served in the Constitutional army; those who have served or are serving personally in the Yaqui campaign; the sons and widows of these and any other persons who have served the cause of the revolution and public instruction; residents of the locality in which the lands requested are located;

"II. The persons mentioned in the preceding fraction who are not residents of the locality where the lands requested are located;

"III. Mexicans working on shares or lessees of the land which is parceled;

"IV. The residents of the locality; and

"V. Any other persons fulfilling the requisites established in article 27 of the general constitution of the Republic and in this law.

"ART. 33. The governor of the State will transfer all requests to the agrarian department, where a register will be kept of them in order to proceed by order of priority with the applications for lots in accordance with the preceding article.

"CHAPTER 7.

"Regarding grantees.

"ART 34. Persons granted lots will have the following obligations, excepting in case of proven "fuerza mayor" (something beyond control):

"I. If relating to agricultural lands which are under cultivation at the time of division, grantees must have them cultivated in their totality within the first year counted from the date on which they are given possession of them;

"II. If relating to lands which were not under cultivation when the division was made, but which are susceptible to immediate cultivation, grantees must cultivate 50 per cent of the land within the first year and the remaining portion within the second year;

"III. If relating to grazing lands requested for cultivation purposes, grantees will have five years in which to place the whole land under cultivation, they being obliged to place under cultivation each year at least 20 per cent of the total area given them;

"IV. If relating to grazing lands requested for that purpose, grantees must constantly maintain on the land at least 15 head of cattle or 30 head of sheep;

"V. When the time limits have elapsed which are stipulated by fractions I, II, and III, they must not fail to cultivate the land during two consecutive years;

"VI. Grantees must pay in due time the yearly payments which they should make to redeem the value of their parcel of land and the interest which said value yields as well as pay the State and municipal taxes which are placed upon them;

"VII. During the period of time the value of the lot is unpaid in its totality grantees can not transfer, mortgage, or encumber in any manner, nor speculate in any form, with the titles of ownership, any contract or operation entered into for those objects being absolutely null by law, the ownership of the lot referred to being transferable only by inheritance during the time its total value has not been paid;

"VIII. Grantees must inscribe their lot or lots in the office of the tax collector (Catastro) of the municipality to which it belongs and in the public registry of property, for fiscal and statistical purposes; and

"IX. Personally cultivate or administer the lot or lots granted them. They will not be permitted to cultivate same through absenteeism, grant same gratis, nor rent same in any form whatsoever.

"ART. 35. When a grantee fails to comply with the stipulations of fractions I, II, III, IV, V, VII, and IX of the preceding article, the Government will declare that the lot or lots which may have been granted can again be asked for, publishing a declaration to this effect in the Boletin Oficial three times consecutively, eight days apart, and making use of any other means of publicity.

"ART. 36. When the order mentioned in the preceding article is complied with, the lot or lots will be granted to the first applicant who fulfills the requisites exacted by this law and who pays in cash 25 per cent of the money paid by the delinquent farmer and also 50 per cent of the value of the improvements made on the land, and the balance of the money paid or to be paid in installments as stipulated in the contract of grant. The 25 per cent mentioned will be delivered to the first grantee, the balance remaining in favor of the State, as well as the price of the improvements installed, the transfer expenses being for the account of the State.

"ART. 37. Grantees who infringe upon the dispositions contained in fractions VI and VIII of article 34 will be subject to the sanctions which the laws relative thereto establish, and as regards the payment of the annual payments which they have to pay to redeem the value of the parcel of land and the interest which said sum yields they will subject themselves to the disposition of the contracts of grant.

"CHAPTER 8.

"Regarding price and payments of lots.

"ART. 38. The value of the land appropriated will be paid by the government of the State in bonds of the agrarian debt, which will be redeemable at the time and in the manner stipulated by the law relative thereto.

"ART. 39. The value of each lot will be paid by the grantee in 20 annual payments to redeem the capital and interest which this draws at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

"ART. 40. The payment of the annual payments will be paid to the special department of the general treasury of the State during the first 15 days of the month of July.

"ART. 41. An annual payment not paid within the time limit will be subject to the payment of the interest as stipulated in article 39.

"ART. 42. When the division is made by the Government the value of each hectare will be that determined by or accepted in the tax or collection of rents offices with an increase of 10 per cent, in addition to the value of the improvements and the proportional expenses caused by the division. The value of improvements will be fixed by experts, one named by the owner, another by the grantee, and a third will be named by the Government in case of discord.

"CHAPTER 9.

"General dispositions.

"ART. 43. Lots granted as per this law will be turned over to grantees free of encumbrance, persons having credits against the land reserving the right to bring action in accordance to the laws relative thereto.

"ART. 44. The subterfuge of a bargain and sale contract (compravanta) entered into after the promulgation of this law will be considered as a direct act to elude the compliance of this law, and the lands contracted for by subterfuge will be liable by law, in view of this sole circumstance, to the identical consequences as large landed properties not voluntarily divided up by their owners.

"ART. 45. Difficulties which may arise due to the application of this law will be settled by the executive of the State.

"TRANSITORY.

"ART. 1. The executive of the State is empowered to issue the necessary regulations of the application of this law and name the employees of the agrarian department.

"ART. 2. This law will be published by public proclamation through the State on the 27th day of July of the current year, becoming effective on that date.

"ART. 3. For the application of this law all dispositions which counteract same are declared void.

"Communicate same to the executive for his sanction and observance.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 7500. An act to protect the coastwise trade of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JOHN D. RYAN.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the morning Washington Post contains a somewhat sensational article regarding a gentleman who is well known to me. It is headlined, "John D. Ryan accused." It announces that grave charges involving the official conduct of this gentleman, who was at one time at the head of the Aircraft Production, have been developed at a certain hearing of a House committee. The premature publication of such a charge is perhaps unavoidable, and especially in exciting times like these, but it is a typical instance of the rank injustice that is thoughtlessly—and I am charitable enough to believe it is thoughtless—inflicted upon gentlemen of the highest standing and character, and which, of course, furnish material for their enemies to utilize as their interests or their opportunities may suggest.

I am proud of Mr. Ryan's personal friendship. He came to the assistance of the Government at a very critical hour during the prosecution of the war. It was a time when the fate of the struggle not only hung in the balance but the probabilities seemed to favor the boasted triumph of the German Kaiser. He left the management of a business of stupendous magnitude, and one which then more than at any other time required his personal attention that he might serve his country without money and without price.

He was appointed Assistant Secretary of War and subsequently assigned to the position of manager and director of aircraft construction by the President. He assumed these duties with the greatest reluctance, but due to his vigorous management and his experience as a director of large industrial affairs he succeeded in bringing order out of a somewhat chaotic condition, and had begun the production of aircraft upon a large and successful scale, only leaving his post when the danger was over and the armistice in full operation.

Mr. President, I have known Mr. Ryan ever since he was a struggling young man just beginning life in the city of Denver. He lived there for a number of years and his business career was absolutely without reproach. His abilities were notable from the outset. He soon attracted the attention of old friends in Montana, and shortly after the death of Mr. Daly he was translated to that State, where his abilities received full play and where his success was extraordinary. From there he went to the city of New York, since which time he has been actively engaged in industrial affairs and has everywhere received, as he has deserved, the commendation and confidence of all with whom he came in contact.

Mr. Ryan's record is as "clean as a hound's tooth," and it is outrageous that a man who has given the public service which he so freely gave should be subjected in advance to such disgraceful announcements as the one which I am criticizing. It is wrong. It can not be justified under any circumstances. Of course, if a full investigation should demonstrate that he or any other official has been guilty of improper practices that should be made known, but to anticipate such a condition by the publication of so-called grave charges is little short of criminal, and I for one condemn at this time and in this forum as vigorously as I can such premature attacks upon the reputation of honest and capable men. We can concede much to politics, but not the right to calumniate the character of an honorable and eminent citizen.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am glad that the esteemed Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has testified to his knowledge of Mr. Ryan's character and high standing. I am sure that the testimony of the distinguished Senator from Colorado will carry great weight with all who know him.

I, too, noted what appears to me to be a scurrilous attack upon Mr. Ryan by the action of a House committee in giving wide publicity to grave charges without any accompanying proof or a particle of evidence to support them. I noticed the report of it in the morning Post and hastily scanned it. I did not have time to read it in full, but shall. I regard it as most unjust and unfair to a thoroughly honorable man.

Mr. Ryan is a citizen of the State of Montana, where he has lived and made his home and conducted business for about 25 years. I have not had the pleasure of knowing him so long as has the Senator from Colorado, but perhaps I have known him quite as well. I have known Mr. Ryan nearly all of the time he has lived in Montana and I hold him in the very highest esteem. My confidence in him is unqualified and unbounded. I believe he is a man who always intends to do the right, and it alone.

Mr. Ryan is a gentleman of the very highest standing in the State of Montana, where he is widely known and esteemed. His standing is high all over the United States among the people who know him. His character is beyond question. His word is as good as any bond. His probity and integrity are irreproachable in every way; irreproachable and unimpeachable in the business world, personally, socially, and in every other way. The people of Montana have entire confidence in Mr. Ryan and in his integrity and honesty. I do not believe there is a particle of foundation for the charges that have been brought against him and that have been scattered broadcast in the prints of the day. Upon an investigation of the charges I believe Mr. Ryan will come out entirely harmless and unscathed. I believe it can be shown that he rendered highly valuable services to the United States Government in time of great stress and need, with no motive but the purest patriotism and the most unselfish loyalty. He accepted the position which was given him, that of superintendent of aircraft production and aviation, with reluctance at the urgent solicitation, I understand, of the President of the United States.

It was at a great sacrifice that Mr. Ryan accepted this important position. I have understood and I believe that the services which he rendered to his country in that position were of the highest order and of great value and were greatly appreciated by the President of the United States and the Secretary of War. In fact, in the same article to which reference has been made here I am pleased to see that the Secretary of War comes to the defense of Mr. Ryan and upholds his work in the warmest terms. The Secretary says Mr. Ryan is entirely innocent of the charges made and vouches for him.

Mr. Ryan served for a time during the war as Assistant Secretary of War. In that position he was intimately associated with Secretary Baker, who knew well his work. Mr. Ryan held that high position, with which were connected most important duties, without a word of reproach or of condemnation or of criticism, so far as I know, during the time he was rendering his valuable services. As Assistant Secretary of War Mr. Ryan was in entire charge of aircraft production. He devoted his entire time and all his ability and energy to the duties of the position, and it is a matter of common and general knowledge that during the time he held that office our Aviation Service was for the first time put upon a substantial, effective, operating basis, which made our Aviation Service a power in the war. It is also a matter of general knowledge, which I believe can be corroborated by authority of the War Department, that at the time the armistice with Germany was entered into Mr. Ryan had placed our Aviation Service upon a footing where it was for the first time capable of rendering great and invaluable service to the forces of the United States and the Entente Allies, so that if the war had continued any longer the Aviation Service would have been a most important factor in a speedy winning of the war for the United States and the Entente Allies and in bringing about crushing and overwhelming defeat of Germany and her allies. We were literally ready to swamp and overwhelm the Central Powers with a great, irresistible force of aircraft. In fact, before the armistice our aircraft had done a great part in bringing Germany to her knees. It was Mr. Ryan's ability, skill, and service that brought about this. He performed a patriotic, unselfish, valuable service for his country. When he took charge of aircraft production it was thoroughly demoralized and ineffective, and he brought success out of chaos.

I do not believe that there is a word of truth in or a particle of foundation for the reckless charges which have been made against Mr. Ryan and given publicity. I have entire faith in his integrity and innocence. I hope there will be a speedy, complete, and thorough investigation of the charges, and if such be made I believe that Mr. Ryan's character will be thoroughly vindicated of the aspersions that have been cast upon it. I hope that his vindication, which I am sure will be complete, will be given as wide publicity as have the charges against him.

With those who know Mr. Ryan, and especially with those who have been associated with him in any capacity, personal or otherwise, and with those who have observed his great work here he needs no defense. I am sure they are all satisfied of his innocence, but for the world at large, for those who may not know him as well as some do, I hope that a speedy announcement will be made of the disposition of these charges, and I am sure that it will carry proof of innocence and vindication for a man who has rendered great service to his country and than whom none stand higher in the business world of the whole of the United States.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am well acquainted with Mr. Ryan. I think the Senate has repeated the offense of the other House by giving publicity to these newspaper allegations without inserting at the same time the complete exoneration of Mr. Ryan by the Secretary of War, who is familiar with all the circumstances, whereas we are not. It is stated in the same article to which reference has been made:

> Secretary Baker admitted the facts as to the contracts for the Government sales of copper, but insisted that a full understanding of all the circumstances would show nothing improper reflecting upon Mr. Ryan, whom he regards as a high-minded, patriotic, devoted public servant and scrupulously honest in his business affairs.

In view of that fact I think there has been much ado about nothing. The Secretary of War further adds:

> Secretary Baker said that he was aware of the charges that had been made in connection with the spruce-production division; that he knew of demands made by Senator JONES (Republican) of Washington for an investigation, and that these demands had been supported by lumbering interests in the Pacific Northwest.
>
> He told the committee further that the War Department had made an investigation. This investigation, he said, was made by Maj. M. H. Ray, and the report was a complete exoneration of all the operations complained of.

CIRCULATION OF CURRENCY.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that Senate resolution 142 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 142, submitted by Mr. MYERS on July 29, directing the Committee on Banking and Currency to investigate and report upon the advisability of a gradual reduction of the amount of money in circulation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, is morning business closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no further morning business, morning business is closed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 92, which has been on the calendar for some days.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield that I may ask for a unanimous-consent agreement, which perhaps will cover the case the Senator has in mind?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning with No. 51, which is the point where the Senate left off when it last had the calendar under consideration.

Mr. SWANSON. I object to beginning the consideration of the calendar at No. 51.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the number at which we should begin, because the Senate considered the calendar up to that number when it was last under consideration.

Mr. SWANSON. I was not present when one bill came up in which I am interested, and I desire to have that bill considered.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope the Senator will not move to adjourn. The bill which I have in mind ought to be passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not refuse to put the motion to adjourn. The question is on the motion. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. MCKELLAR asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I inquire if the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has not voted. Having a pair with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. That Senator being absent, and understanding that he would vote the same way that I shall vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the negative). I voted, assuming that my pair would come in. As he has not, I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are necessarily absent. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] are detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—13.

Brandegee	Gronna	Phipps	Warren
Calder	King	Smoot
Elkins	New	Sterling
Fernald	Penrose	Thomas

McCormick	Poindexter	Smith, Md.	Walsh, Mass.
McLean	Ransdell	Spencer	Wolcott
Martin	Reed	Stanley
Newberry	Robinson	Townsend
Owen	Shields	Wadsworth

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The first business on the calendar was the resolution (S. Res. 76) defining a peace treaty which shall assure to the people of the United States the attainment of the ends for which they entered the war, and declaring the policy of our Government to meet fully obligations to ourselves and to the world.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. FLETCHER. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 529) for the relief of the heirs of Adam and Noah Brown was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 600) for the relief of the heirs of Mrs. Susan A. Nicholas was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SIMON M. PRESTON.

The bill (S. 1289) for the relief of Simon M. Preston was announced as next in order. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Simon M. Preston, of Seattle, Wash., $5,838.36, being the amount of the defalcation of D. C. Kearns, a deputy collector under the said Simon M. Preston, who was collector of internal revenue for the first election district of Mississippi from the 1st day of June, 1869, to the 22d day of May, 1873, which was repaid to the United States Government by the said Simon M. Preston, and its collection by him from the said D. C. Kearns having been hindered and prevented by the pardon of D. C. Kearns by the President of the United States and the remission of the fine equivalent to said sum.

Mr. KING. Let us hear the report, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report, submitted by Mr. ROBINSON on June 24, 1919, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1289) for the relief of Simon M. Preston, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

The facts in the case are fully set forth in Senate Report No. 763, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session, which is appended hereto and made a part of this report.

[Senate Report No. 763, 65th Cong., 3d sess.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1102) for the relief of Simon M. Preston, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

The facts in the case are fully set forth in Senate Report No. 366, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, which is appended hereto and made a part of this report.

[Senate Report No. 366, 64th Congress, 1st sess.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1288) for the relief of Simon M. Preston, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

A report made by this committee upon a similar bill during the Sixty-third Congress, which is hereto attached and made a part hereof, quite fully states the facts upon which the claim is based.

[Senate Report No. 375, 63d Cong., 2d sess.]

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 691) for the relief of Simon M. Preston, late collector of internal revenue for the district of Mississippi, reports as follows:

That it appears that Simon M. Preston was collector of internal revenue and also stamp agent for the first collection district of Mississippi from June 1, 1869, to May 22, 1873; that it was necessary for him to have deputy collectors; that one D. C. Kearns, who was highly recommended, was appointed deputy collector and entered into bonds, with sureties at the time deemed good, for the faithful discharge of his duties; that said Kearns continued to act as deputy collector until the 1st of March, 1871, when it was discovered that he, the said Kearns, had embezzled moneys collected by him for the United States and was a defaulter for the sum of $6,400, for which amount said collector, Simon M. Preston, was bound to the Government and for which he stood debtor to the Government in his account; that the said collector caused the said Kearns to be indicted and convicted and fined $5,836.38, which was the amount of his unpaid defalcations, and sentenced to be imprisoned for 12 months; that the said Kearns was soon after pardoned by the President of the United States and relieved from said fine and imprisonment; that the said Kearns and the said sureties were irresponsible, and there was no means of getting the amount embezzled by him; that the pardon and release of said Kearns removed all chances of compelling restoration from him, and the said collector, Simon M. Preston, was obliged to make good to the Government the defalcation of said Kearns, whereby great injustice was done him.

It further appears that said collector, Simon M. Preston, was a stranger in Mississippi when he was appointed collector there and did not know and was unable to find out the financial responsibilities of said Kearns's bondsmen. These bondsmen were all men of apparently good reputation and prominent in the citizenship of Mississippi.

It also appears that as a result of the suit brought by said Preston against the sureties of said Kearns there could not be recovered the amount of said defalcations, the balance being the amount claimed in this bill, viz, $5,836.38.

It further appears that the statute under which said Kearns was tried and convicted provided that in case of conviction the defendant should not only be imprisoned but he should be fined the amount of his defalcation. He was convicted and fined according to statute and sent to prison, but soon thereafter Gov. Ames, an ambitious statesman of Mississippi, listened to the requests of influential friends of Kearns and urged upon President Grant the pardon of Kearns. It seems quite clear that President Grant consented to do this with the understanding and upon the consideration that the amount of Kearns's defalcation should be made good. The President was informed that this had been done, and there seems to be no doubt but that the President believed that Kearns and his friends had repaid the amount stolen, whereas the fact is that Preston himself had paid the amount to the Government. The claimant, Preston, protested against the pardon of Kearns until the latter repaid to Preston the amount of money that he, Preston, had paid to the Government on account of the wrongdoing of Kearns. It appears that certain influential friends of Kearns were at the time of the pardon making arrangements to refund to Preston the amount he had been obliged to pay for his defaulting deputy, but the hasty pardon by the President prevented the consummation of this.

We do not believe that Mr. Preston has any legal claim against the Government, but we do believe that he has an equitable claim due to the fact that by the action of the President in granting a pardon the claimant was denied the right which the statute evidently contemplated when it required as a part of the penalty the imposition of a fine equal to the amount of the defalcation.

Mr. Preston has no other remedy, and the use of the remedy herein granted is inferentially indorsed by the Supreme Court of the United States (148 U. S., 573) in the following language:

"It is a well-settled rule of law that the Government is not liable for the nonfeasance or malfeasance or negligence of its officers, and that the only remedy to the injured party in such cases is by appeal to Congress."

We therefore report the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, are any of these parties now alive?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is unacquainted with them.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Claims. I wish to state that I have been unable to attend the meetings of that committee. I want it understood, however, that I shall not vote for this bill until I get some explanation as to whether the person claiming this amount is alive.

Mr. PENROSE and Mr. SMOOT. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1479) for the relief of the estate of Moses M. Bane was announced as next in order.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1004) for the relief of the owner of the steam lighter Cornelia was announced as next in order.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KIRBY. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1005) for the relief of the owner of the steamship Matoa was next on the calendar, and was read.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I would like to ask some member of the Committee on Claims in charge of the bill, as there are a number of bills of this character, why there should be special bills upon this subject? What are the exceptional circumstances in these cases that call for the action of Congress? Ought there not be a general law covering all cases, unless there be special circumstances in these particular cases? I think the Senate ought to know something about it before it passes these bills. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. KING. I make a similar request as to the three bills following this one on the calendar, namely, the bill (S. 1006) for the relief of the schooner Horatio G. Foss, the bill (S. 1222) for the relief of the schooner Henry O. Barrett, and the bill (S. 1223) for the relief of the owner of the steamer Mayflower and for the relief of passengers on board said steamer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bills will be passed over.

BUFFALO RIVER ZINC MINING CO.

The bill (S. 728) for the relief of the Buffalo River Zinc Mining Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Buffalo River Zinc Mining Co., a corporation of St. Louis, Mo., the sum of $4,200, being the amount of money paid by the said company to the United States of America on or about the 21st day of July, 1904, as the purchase price of certain public lands in Searcy County, Ark., the patents to which have since been canceled at the suit of the United States of America and the said lands having been restored to the public domain: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall first make an investigation of all the facts concerning said claim, and shall be satisfied of its justness and of the good faith of the said company and its officers, and that the acts of the agent of the company by reason of which the said patents were canceled were done wholly without the knowledge or consent of said company or any of its officers, and shall certify these facts to the Secretary of the Treasury, the expense, however, of said investigation, if any, shall be deducted from the amount found to be due said company.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARUNDEL SAND & GRAVEL CO.

The bill (S. 1670) for the relief of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask to have the bill read, and then I would like to make a statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was read in full yesterday.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this is a claim growing out of a collision between a schooner, or some ship belonging to this company, and a United States ship on the 26th day of November, 1917. As I understand the law, one can sue in the Court of Claims on a contract. This is a claim for unliquidated damages, and unless authority is given for the court to determine the question the claimants have no authority to get recovery. The difference between this and other claims in bills that have been presented here is that it does not provide for the payment of money, but simply empowers the district court to hear the facts and enter a decree, as is done by the Court of Claims, and then the case comes back to Congress. In this case the district court can decree either for the Government against the party or in favor of the party against the Government. It is very difficult to get such cases before the Court of Claims, and this claim has been pending two years. In cases of this kind, where the Government was at fault, the collision having been caused by a Government vessel, it is nearly impossible for the claimant to get relief.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask, if relief is to be given in these particular cases, why should there not be a general law upon the subject giving everybody like relief?

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the Government has never gone far enough to allow suits in the Court of Claims for unliquidated damages.

Mr. LENROOT. But why should there be a special bill for each of these cases? If it is right at all, why should there not be a general law letting everybody in like circumstances go into court and bring an action?

Mr. SWANSON. Because the cases are not very numerous.

Mr. LENROOT. There are numerous bills on the calendar for that purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. It has never been possible to get any general legislation. It seems to me a great hardship if a person has suffered great loss on account of the fault of the Government that he can not go into the courts of the Government itself and have a decree entered either for the Government or against the Government, and let it be brought back to Congress. It does seem to me it is very hard that this kind of a case should not be disposed of in this way, but should wait for general legislation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think there is a good deal of force in what the Senator from Wisconsin has said. If we are going to deal with these collision cases, they should all be dealt with alike. The others are to go over, and I think this one ought also to go over.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the difference between this and the other cases is that the others directed money to be paid out of the Treasury. Congress has always insisted on the right to supervise the decrees that are made for the payment of money from the Treasury.

Mr. LODGE. Not of an admiralty court.

Mr. SWANSON. It generally has done so. I should say that this bill is so drawn that it will come back to Congress.

Mr. LODGE. Decrees of United States courts are always paid.

Mr. SWANSON. If there is a judgment against the United States. Provision is made for the Attorney General to be notified and to have a suit brought, and then the decree is certified to Congress for payment.

Mr. LODGE. Let them all go together, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

EMMA H. RIDLEY.

The bill (S. 174) for the relief of Emma H. Ridley was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

GOVERNMENT DORMITORIES IN WASHINGTON.

Senate resolution 52 was announced as next in order and was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the proper officers of the United States Housing Corporation are hereby respectfully requested to transmit to the Senate information as follows:

(1) Information as to what percentage of the Government buildings known as employees' dormitories, situated between the Capitol Building and the Union Station, Washington, D. C., was completed and ready for occupancy November 11, 1918.

(2) Information as to what sum of money has been spent in the construction work in connection with these buildings since November 11, 1918.

(3) Information as to whether the said buildings are now complete and entirely ready for occupancy, and if so, when the work was completed. If work was not completed before May 11, 1919, how many men were at that time employed on them and when will the work be completed.

(4) Information as to what total revenue the Government was obtaining from the said buildings May 1, 1919.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH FRANCHISE.

The bill (H. R. 5032) to extend the franchise in the parishes and separate congregations of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington, incorporated by act of Congress approved March 16, 1896, is hereby authorized and empowered on the petition of the vestry of any parish or separate congregation to give the same right to women to vote and hold office as is now conferred upon men by existing law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this bill is an illustration of the unwisdom of Congress in granting special charters. It seems to have been the custom in the past to grant special charters for charitable purposes, for business pursuits, and to religious organizations. It is an improper use of the powers of the Federal Government, indeed, a perversion of its powers, for the Federal Government to be granting private and special charters to individuals to engage in philanthropic or religious or business activities. We have a general statute operative within the District of Columbia under which individuals may incorporate for the usual purposes for which incorporations are permitted in the States. I have objected in the past and shall object in the future to the granting of special charters to individuals to carry on charitable work or to engage in private enterprises. I apprehend from the bill that a special charter has been granted, and perhaps the only way to amend it is by an act of Congress, but it reveals the absurdity, the unwisdom, and the impropriety of the policy pursued by Congress in the past. I ask the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], who reported this bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia, whether there was a special charter granted to this organization?

Mr. CAPPER. Yes; the Senator is correct as to that. The charter was granted many years ago, and the church in this city asked that it be amended, no one objecting to it. I think it is absolutely necessary to pass the measure now, if we grant the request of the church, so that women may be permitted to have a vote in the affairs of the parish.

Mr. KING. I entirely sympathize with the purpose. I think the women in the churches ought to vote as well as the men. Indeed, as a rule they contribute more to the churches than do the men, and they ought to have as much voice in the operation of the church as men.

Mr. CAPPER. It may have been a mistake to grant the charter in the first place, but it ought to be corrected at this time.

Mr. KING. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a case of issuing a new charter.

Mr. CAPPER. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. It is that which excites the Senator from Utah so much. It seems to me the bill is pretty harmless. At all events, it is simply to amend an old charter.

Mr. KING. If the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts had been paying attention, he would not have felt the necessity of addressing the Senate or addressing any remarks to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. LODGE. I had to address the Senator from Utah, because he has been occupying all the time of the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT N. COLLINS.

The bill (S. 2128) for the relief of Albert N. Collins was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That homestead entry 036506, Glasgow series, of Albert N. Collins, for lots 2, 3, and 4 and the southeast quarter northwest quarter, section 19, township 25 north, range 38 east, Montana meridian, be, and the same is hereby, validated, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue patent thereon upon submission of satisfactory proof of compliance with the law under which said entry was allowed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REFUND OF LAND-OFFICE PAYMENTS.

The bill (S. 2129) to amend an act approved March 26, 1908, entitled "An act to provide for the repayment of certain commissions, excess payments, and purchase moneys paid under the public-land laws," was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act approved March 26, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 48), entitled "An act to provide for the repayment of certain commissions, excess payments, and purchase moneys paid under the public land laws," be amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That where purchase moneys and commissions paid under any public land law have been or shall hereafter be covered into the Treasury of the United States under any application to make any filing, location, selection, entry, or proof, such purchase moneys and commissions shall be repaid to the person who made such application, entry, or proof, or to his legal representatives, in all cases where such application, entry, or proof has been or shall hereafter be rejected, and neither such applicant nor his legal representatives shall have been guilty of any fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such application: Provided, That such person or his legal representatives shall file a request for the repayment of such purchase moneys and commissions within two years from the rejection of such application, entry, or proof, or within two years from the passage of this act as to such applications, proofs, or entries as have been heretofore rejected.

"SEC. 2. That in all cases where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that any person has heretofore or shall hereafter make any payments to the United States under the public land laws in excess of the amount he was lawfully required to pay under such laws, such excess shall be repaid to such person or to his legal representatives: Provided, That such person or his legal representatives shall file a request for the repayment of such excess within two years after the patent has issued for the land embraced in such payment, or within two years from the passage of this act as to such excess payments as have heretofore been made.

"SEC. 3. That when the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall ascertain the amount of any excess moneys, purchase moneys, or commissions in any case where repayment is authorized by this statute, the Secretary of the Interior shall at once certify such amounts to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is thereby authorized and directed to make repayment of all amounts so certified out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated and issue his warrant in settlement thereof.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS.

The bill (S. 276) to amend sections 4 and 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will be glad if any member of the committee can make some explanation respecting this bill. Does it change existing law materially, and if there is any material change will some Senator be kind enough to advise the Senate or at least to advise me?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as the title of the bill provides, it amends sections 4 and 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916. The Senator will recall that the law provided that wherever an entryman had taken 320 acres under the enlarged homestead law, if it were land of the same character and contiguous to that land, he was entitled to take up to the amount of 640 acres as provided by the homestead law. This is simply an amendment to that law, which the Department of the Interior has asked, so that if land should be taken, it could be taken where it was not contiguous. But the Senator will note that on page 2 of the bill the committee offers an amendment providing—that the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas of the character herein described open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land.

In other words, if there is no noncontiguous land, then land that is of the same character can be entered up to 640 acres, but if there be land contiguous to it then it can not be entered.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 6, after the word "thereof," to insert "Provided, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas of the character herein described open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land"; and, in line 21, after the word "entry," to insert "Provided, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas of the character herein described open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 4 and 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That any homestead entryman of lands of the character herein described who has not submitted final proof upon his existing entry shall have the right to enter, subject to the provisions of this act, such amount of lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act, within a radius of 20 miles from said existing entry, as shall not, together with the amount embraced in his original entry, exceed 640 acres, and residence upon the original entry shall be credited on both entries, but improvements must be made on the additional entry equal to $1.25 for each acre thereof: Provided, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas of the character herein described open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land.

"SEC. 5. That persons who have submitted final proof upon, or received patent for, lands of the character herein described under the homestead laws, and who own and reside upon the land so acquired, may, subject to the provisions of this act, make additional entry for and obtain patent to lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act, within a radius of 20 miles from the lands theretofore acquired under the homestead laws, which, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead laws, shall not exceed 640 acres, on proof of the expenditure required by this act on account of permanent improvements upon the additional entry: Provided, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas of the character herein described open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS AND ENTRYMEN.

The bill (S. 277) to authorize absence by homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, on page 1, line 7, after "1918," to insert "upon the ground that he comes within article 111 of the act of October 6, 1917, fortieth volume Statutes at Large, page 398," and in line 9, after the word "who," to strike out "has made or shall hereafter make" and insert "before entering upon such course shall have made," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who, after discharge from the military or naval service of the United States during the war against Germany and its allies, is furnished any course of vocational rehabilitation under the terms of the vocational rehabilitation act approved June 27, 1918, upon the ground that he comes within article 111 of the act of October 6, 1917, fortieth volume, Statutes at Large, page 398, and who before entering upon such course shall have made entry upon or application for public lands of the United States under the homestead laws, or who has settled or shall hereafter settle upon public lands, shall be entitled to a leave of absence from his land for the purpose of undergoing training by the Federal Board of Vocational Education, and such absence, while actually engaged in such training shall be counted as constructive residence: Provided, That no patent shall issue to any homestead settler who has not resided upon, improved, and cultivated his homestead for a period of at least one year.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to ask if there is not a House bill covering the same ground?

Mr. SMOOT. No; there has been no bill passed which covers this ground. I think the Senator has reference to the bill covering leaves of absence in drought-stricken sections of the country.

Mr. FLETCHER. I remember seeing the title "Leave of absence."

Mr. SMOOT. That had reference to leaves of absence, but no legislation of this character has been passed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNITED WAR-WORK CAMPAIGN.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 42) authorizing national banks to subscribe to the united war-work campaign was announced as next in order.

Mr. PENROSE. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

The bill (S. 175) for the relief of Kny-Scheerer Corporation was announced as next in order.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have been informed that this bill S. 175, for the relief of Kny-Scheerer Corporation, and the next one on the calendar, S. 2145, for the relief of Edward N. McCarty, were reported by the chairman through mistake. I therefore move that they be taken from the calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 631) repealing certain provisions contained in the urgent deficiency act approved December 22, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LENROOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1722) for the relief of Watson B. Dickerman, administrator for the estate of Charles Backman, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

PETER M'KAY.

The bill (S. 390) for the relief of Peter McKay was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask some member of the committee if there is any general provision for meeting cases of this character,

Mr. GRONNA. I was not present in committee when it was agreed that this bill should be reported out, but I will say to the Senator that I am familiar with the case, because a similar bill was before the committee during the last session. It is in compliance with general law. We have the right in cases of this kind to allow one year's salary, and so far as I know no bill has been reported out for more than one year's pay where it was a case of personal injury.

Mr. KING. This, I understand, is a personal injury and not a death case?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; it is a personal injury case.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$2,500," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Peter McKay, or his legal representatives, the sum of $2,500, as full compensation for permanent injuries received by the said McKay on the 5th day of May, 1904, at Fort Worden, in the State of Washington, by being struck with a large piece of log hurled by the explosion of an excessive blast of powder discharged without warning by employees of the United States Government engaged in clearing lands at said Fort Worden under the direction and control of the United States Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALASKAN STEAMSHIP CO.

The bill (S. 629) for the relief of the Alaskan Steamship Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice that the auditor, Mr. E. D. Hearne, in summing up this bill in his report, makes the following statement:

The Alaskan Steamship Co. was clearly under contract with Nichols to take the 122 cannery employees from Seward to Seattle, and the claim of $25 per capita for that part of the trip is without equity.

I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

JAMES W. CROSS.

The bill (S. 822) for the relief of James W. Cross was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, after the name "Cross," to strike out "$660" and insert "$92," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James W. Cross $92, as full compensation to said James W. Cross for personal injuries received as a result of an accident October 26, 1914, without negligence on his part, while he was engaged in the performance of his duties as a laborer at the State, War, and Navy Department Building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALFRED SJOSTROM.

The bill (S. 1195) for the relief of Alfred Sjostrom was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$720," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Alfred Sjostrom the sum of $720 for injuries sustained by him while in the performance of his duties as an employee of the Government at Battle Mountain Sanitarium, Hot Springs, S. Dak., on December 3, 1910, in an accident in which he lost all the fingers of his right hand.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY BLACKBURN.

The bill (S. 429) to authorize an exchange of lands with Henry Blackburn was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, before the word "six," to strike out "east" and insert "west," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept title to the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 19, township 39 south, range 6 west, Salt Lake meridian, and to convey in exchange therefor to Henry Blackburn, of Orderville, Utah, title to the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 30, township 39 south, range 6 west, Salt Lake meridian, and upon reconveyance the land deeded to the United States shall thereupon become part of the Sevier National Forest and subject to all laws and regulations applicable thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENTRIES OF MINORS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill (S. 1729) permitting minors of the age of 18 years or over to make homestead entry or other entry of the public lands of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any minor of the age of 18 years or over, and otherwise qualified under the public-land laws, shall be permitted to make homestead entry, under and subject to the homestead laws of the United States: Provided, That no minor shall be permitted to make final proof upon such an entry or receive patent therefor until he or she shall have attained the age of 24 years: Provided further, That such entryman shall comply with all the requirements of the homestead laws as to cultivation and improvement of the land entered, but shall not be required to establish or maintain residence thereupon until he she shall have attained the age of 21 years, and final proof upon such an entry may be submitted at any time within two years after such entryman shall have attained the age of 24 years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill permitting minors of the age of 18 years or over to make homestead entry of the public lands of the United States."

LINCOLN HIGHWAY ASSOCIATION.

The bill (S. 2220) granting to the Lincoln Highway Association, incorporated under the laws of the State of Michigan, a right of way through certain public lands of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That right of way 500 feet in width through the public lands of the United States, beginning at or near Orr's ranch, Tooele County, Utah, thence via Broad Hollow Pass and the north point of Granite Mountain to a point known as Black Point, thence westerly to the mouth of Overland Canyon and for 10 miles into said canyon, is hereby granted to the Lincoln Highway Association, incorporated under the laws of the State of Michigan. There is also granted the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the right of way, material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction of the highway.

Before the grant of the right of way herein provided for shall become effective, a map of location of the route of said highway and an outline of the general rules and regulations under which the Lincoln Highway Association will govern said highway, must be filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That all or any part of the easement herein granted may be forfeited and annulled by the Secretary of the Interior for failure to construct the highway within five years after the approval of maps of location or for nonuser after construction or for abandonment without further legislative or judicial action.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, which is embodied in the report of the committee, recommending certain amendments to the bill. One amendment that he suggests is to limit the region outside of the right of way from which material can be taken from the public lands to 100 feet in width.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Florida that I notice that the Secretary's letter is dated December 27, 1917. A similar bill has previously passed the Senate with an amendment inserting the word "States," which had inadvertently been omitted. I think the pending bill covers exactly what the bill as it previously passed the Senate covered.

It is to provide for the construction of a link in the Lincoln Highway over which it is now almost impossible to pass. A citizen of the United States has donated $125,000, as I remember, for the construction of this road through this stretch of country, and it is expected to begin construction just as soon as this legislation is enacted.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would the Senator from Utah have any objection to the amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, for instance, in line 5, page 2, so that instead of the language used in the bill, "and an outline of the general rules and regulations under which the Lincoln Highway Association will govern said highway," it would provide that the applicant will be required to file for approval the actual rules and regulations under which it is proposed to conduct the highway, rather than a mere outline of the rules? That is one suggestion which the Secretary makes, and I do not see but that it would be entirely acceptable to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, Mr. President, that I think that is sufficiently provided for by the following language in the bill:

Before the grant of the right of way herein provided for shall become effective a map of location of the route of said highway and an outline of the general rules and regulations under which the Lincoln Highway Association will govern said highway, must be filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Of course it may be that the rules and regulations will be changed at some time, and if we provide for the filing of an outline the matter will always thereafter be under the charge and direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not going to insist on the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Florida that so far as the land in question is concerned it is practically worthless. My colleague, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], knows very well what sort of country this road runs through. It is, in fact, at one end of a lake in the county referred to, where the water is briny and where nothing will grow. The bill is simply designed to secure the completion of that link of the Lincoln Highway. As I have stated, a citizen of the United States has offered to put up the money to build the road provided the right of way can be obtained, and of course that can not be done unless this bill is passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think this is all right; but I have merely called the attention of the Senator to the amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, thinking it might be entirely satisfactory to him and save trouble in the House.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DRAFT REGISTRANTS ASSIGNED TO EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 70) relating to the induction of registrants who applied and were accepted for induction and assigned to educational institutions for special and technical training under the provisions of the act approved August 31, 1918, but whose induction without fault of their own was not completed was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That registrants who applied and who were accepted, prior to November 1, 1918, for induction and assignment to educational institutions for special and technical training under the provisions of the act approved August 31, 1918, but whose induction, through no fault of their own, was not completed prior to November 11, 1918, shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, be regarded as having been fully inducted into the service, as of the day they reported and were accepted for duty and training at such educational institutions, and shall be entitled to the regular pay and allowances for said period of their actual military service under said act, and to a discharge from the military service as of the dates of termination of their actual military service under the said act.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AFFAIRS IN COSTA RICA.

The resolution (S. Res. 105) requesting the Secretary of State to inform the Senate why Nicaragua is permitted to invade Costa Rica, and why Costa Rica was not permitted to sign the treaty of peace at Versailles, submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on June 30 (calendar date July 1), 1919, was considered by unanimous consent.

The resolution had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments, on page 1, line 1, after the word "the," to strike out "Secretary of State" and insert "President"; in line 2, after the word "Senate," to strike out "why" and insert "if not incompatible with the public interest, whether"; in line 3, after the name "Nicaragua," to strike out "a country over which the United States is maintaining a protectorate"; in line 7, after the name "Costa Rica," to strike out "a nation which has been and now is a friend of the United States" and insert "or has permitted armed bands to organize or rendevous within her territory for such purposes"; in line 11, after the word "the," to strike out "Secretary of State" and insert "President"; in line 12, after the word "Senate," to strike out "if not incompatible with the public interest"; and on page 2, line 2, after the name "Versailles," to strike out ", in view of the fact that the present Government of Costa Rica had been formally recognized as a cobelligerent by all the Allies in the war against Germany, except by the United States, and recognized by the neutral nations of the earth as a constitutional government," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether Nicaragua has been and is now permitted, with armed forces, to invade and to threaten with invasion the territory of Costa Rica, or has permitted armed bands to organize or rendezvous within her territory for such purposes: And be it further

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, for what reason Costa Rica, a belligerent with the Allies in the war just ended, was not permitted to sign the treaty of peace at Versailles.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2259) for the relief of Edward S. Farrow was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1726) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to my colleague that this is an exact duplicate of the bill which passed the Senate in the closing days of the last session, but failed of passage in the House.

Mr. KING. I am aware of that; but I desire to make some observations in regard to the measure which will take some time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ZONING COMMISSION.

The bill (S. 1369) to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District of Columbia and to create a zoning commission, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, in section 1, page 2, line 1, after the word "compensation," to strike out "The Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia shall be the executive officer of said commission, and such," and insert "Such"; and in line 7, after the word "compensation," to insert "There is hereby authorized for the expenses of said commission, including the employment of expert services, and all incidental and contingent expenses, the sum of $5,000, payable one half out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia," so as to make the section read:

That to protect the public health, secure the public safety, and to protect property in the District of Columbia there is hereby created a zoning commission, which shall consist of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds of the District of Columbia, and the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds, which said commission shall have all the powers and perform all the duties hereinafter specified and shall serve without additional compensation. Such employees of the government of the District of Columbia as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act shall be assigned to such duty by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia without additional compensation. There is hereby authorized for the expenses of said commission, including the employment of expert services, and all incidental and contingent expenses, the sum of $5,000, payable one half out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. I think I shall object to this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CALDER. I hope the Senator will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I will hear the Senator; but it seems to me the bill proposes to create another commission.

Mr. CALDER. The bill provides that certain officials of the Government already paid salaries shall be appointed a commission to determine the character of buildings which may be erected upon the different streets of the District of Columbia. I may say that it is copied to some extent from a law enacted in New York City some years ago. It will prevent a man building a garage, a business house, upon a residential street or in a section reserved for private homes; it will prevent the erection of great, high apartment houses on streets reserved for a different character of buildings.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that there is no necessity for creating a vast amount of machinery for the purpose of passing upon permits for the construction of buildings. I can not understand why an additional appropriation should be required.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it is necessary to have the proposed commission appointed in order to lay out the districts and determine the different zones; but after once having established the zones, the building department of the District government or the District Commissioners will be able to carry out the law without any further expenditure. The $5,000 provided for in the bill is for the purpose of employing experts to assist in determining the zones and the character of buildings which may be erected in various locations. I think this measure is very much desired by the residents of the District of Columbia generally; it is a measure tending to beautify the city, and it is strongly urged by the District Commissioners.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if there is not already a law regulating the height of buildings, and all that sort of thing?

Mr. CALDER. There is such a law; but there is no law regulating the use of buildings and the character of buildings that may be erected in the different sections of the city. This matter has been very carefully examined.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator think that the proposed zoning commission ought to have the right to say for what purpose a building shall be used?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; to this extent, that when a certain section may be set apart for a certain character of buildings it is desirable that buildings not of the specified character should be forbidden in that area. For instance, on Sixteenth Street, which is strictly a residential street, in the absence of restrictions of any kind, immediately contiguous to a beautiful residence some one may ask for a permit to build a garage. The enactment of this bill into law would prevent that.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just what I was fearful of. Some years ago I built a home on Connecticut Avenue at Calvert Street. It happened that I had room enough in the rear of the dwelling, facing Calvert Street, to build a small garage; but as soon as I undertook to begin the construction of the garage I was told that I could not carry on the work. I asked by what law could I be prevented from using my lot for that purpose, and was told that a garage might be detrimental to the adjoining property; and not only that, but it would not be very nice for the people on the other side of the street to have a garage to look at all the time.

Mr. President, I know what the sentiment is here; and I know that if this bill passes, and the words "use of building" are in it, they will say just where you can have your garage. If you have not got a piece of ground near your home, inside, where nobody can see it, you will never have one.

I think this bill will have to be amended so far as the use of the building is concerned, at least. For that reason I ask that it go over.

Mr. CALDER. I am certain that if the Senator examines the bill carefully he will be assured that it is a meritorious measure.

Mr. SMOOT. It will stop the building of garages.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A garage is a building, is it not?

Mr. KING. I ask that it go over also.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

MILK RIVER VALLEY GUN CLUB.

The bill (S. 793) authorizing the issuance of patent to the Milk River Valley Gun Club was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the word "acres," to insert "to be used," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent to the Milk River Valley Gun Club for lots 5 and 6 and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 32, township 31 north, range 31 east, Montana meridian, Montana, containing 76.69 acres, upon payment of $1.25 per acre and the further payment of $50 per irrigable acre for the construction of irrigation works for the Milk River irrigation project, the irrigable area being fixed at 30 acres, to be used for a game preserve: Provided, That said Milk River Valley Gun Club shall apply for patent and tender full payment within six months from the date of approval of this act: Provided further, That patent issued hereunder shall contain a reservation to the United States of all gas, oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in said land, and the right to the use of the land for extracting the same, and shall be subject to all rights under the T. E. Brady Canal and Bowdoin Lake Reservoir approved by the Secretary of the Interior October 23, 1901, under the act approved March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L., p. 1095), and the patent shall also reserve to the United States right of way for canals, ditches, and telephone lines heretofore or hereafter constructed by the authority of the United States: And provided further, That if the land is ever used for any purpose other than that herein authorized title thereto shall revert to and revest in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS FOR SCHOOL PURPOSES.

The bill (S. 794) granting lands for school purposes in Government town sites on reclamation projects was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the word "grounds," to insert "Provided, That if any land so conveyed cease entirely to be used for school purposes, title thereto shall revert to and revest in the United States," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be hereby authorized, upon application by the proper officers of a school district located wholly or in part within the boundaries of a project of the United States Reclamation Service, to issue patent conveying to such district such unappropriated undisposed of lands within any Government reclamation town site situated within such school district as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, are necessary for use by said district for school buildings and grounds: Provided, That if any land so conveyed cease entirely to be used for school purposes, title thereto shall revert to and revest in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATION, NORTH POINT, MD.

The bill (S. 2494) to transfer the tract of land known as the lighthouse reservation at North Point, Md., from the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce to the jurisdiction of the War Department was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described tract of land situated at North Point, Md., now under the control and jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce, and known as the Lighthouse Reservation, at North Point, Md., be, and the same hereby is, transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of the War Department for use for military purposes:

Beginning at a post now set in the ground north, 82° east, 1¼ perches from the center of a stump, and north 65° west, 14 perches from a large black oak tree now marked, and running thence south 65° east, 14 perches to the said black oak, thence still south 65° east, 12¼ perches to a post north, 65¾° east, 12 perches to a post standing southwardly 9 feet from a large white oak, thence south 47° east, 48 perches to a marked sassafras, thence still south 47° east, 2 perches, to the water of Chesapeake Bay, thence bounding on the water of said bay and Patapsco River south, 74° west 7 perches, south 80½° west 10 perches, north 71° west 15 perches, north 57½° west 12 perches, north 46½° west 12 perches, north 46½° west 44⅘ perches, until it intersects a line drawn south 48° west from the place of beginning, and thence to the beginning, containing 7 acres and 22 square perches of land more or less.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CRANEY ISLAND AND FISHERMANS ISLAND, VA.

The bill (S. 2495) transferring the tract of land known as Craney Island from the jurisdiction of the War Department to the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department and transferring the tract of land known as Fishermans Island from the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department to the jurisdiction of the War Department was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that the military reservation known as Craney Island, now under the control and jurisdiction of the War Department, lying on the western side of the Elizabeth River in Norfolk County, Va., and bounded by the waters of the Elizabeth River, Craney Island Creek, Thoroughfare Creek, and James River, be transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service; and that the sand spit or island called Fishermans Island or Linen Bar, now under the control and jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, situate, lying, and being in the county of Northampton off the point of Cape Charles, between the Atlantic Ocean and Chesapeake Bay, in the eastern district of Virginia, about 12 miles south of Cape Charles City and about 1¼ miles from Cape Charles Light, containing 225 acres, more or less, above high-water mark, be transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of the War Department for use for military purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2496) authorizing the retirement of members of the Army Nurse Corps (female) was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ORION MATHEWS.

The bill (S. 608) for the relief of Orion Mathews was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withdraw that request. This bill has passed the Senate twice, has been unanimously reported by the Senate Military Affairs Committee twice, and is a very meritorious measure.

Mr. KING. I will withhold the objection until I hear the Senator. I understood that it was a case of desertion.

Mr. MYERS. The facts of the case are these: The report shows that Mr. Mathews, who was very young, enlisted and served during a large part of the war. He served until his term of enlistment was out. Then he immediately reenlisted, and served until March or April, 1865, when he disappeared from the service and did not report again, and technically the charge of desertion was entered against him. Affidavits and proofs brought before the committee show, however, that Mr. Mathews participated in about 40 battles, that he served four years, that he was wounded at Antietam, was subsequently wounded in another battle, and a notation of honorable discharge was entered after his name in the war records. The committee thought, in view of his four years of service, whatever may have been the cause for his disappearing from the service at that late day, less than a month before the surrender of Gen. Lee, that he might well be restored to an honorable position on the records of the War Department. That is all that the bill does. It has been reported by the committee twice and has passed the Senate twice, but it has never passed the House for lack of time.

Those are the facts. There is a great deal of merit in them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course the purpose of the bill is to restore this man to the rolls of the War Department and give him a pension. I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 609) for the relief of James Duffy was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 610) for the relief of Henry J. Davis was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

EASTERN DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY.

The bill (S. 2476) to amend the act establishing the eastern district of Kentucky was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That regular terms of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Kentucky shall be held at the following times and places, namely:

At Jackson: Beginning on the first Monday in March and the third Monday in September in each year.

At Frankfort: Beginning on the second Monday in March and the fourth Monday in September in each year.

At Covington: Beginning on the first Monday in April and the third Monday in October in each year.

At Richmond: Beginning on the fourth Monday in April and the second Monday in November in each year.

At London: Beginning on the second Monday in May and the fourth Monday in November in each year.

At Catlettsburg: Beginning on the fourth Monday in May and the second Monday in December in each year.

At Lexington: Beginning on the second Monday in January and the second Monday in June in each year.

And at such other times and places as may hereafter be provided by law.

The clerk of the court for the eastern district of Kentucky shall maintain an office in charge of himself, a deputy, or a clerical assistant at each of the places of holding court within said district.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee report to strike out the preamble.

The preamble was stricken out.

THE PHILIPPINE SCOUTS.

The bill (S. 2447) for the relief of the Philippine Scouts was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the word "duty," to insert "or when any such officer has heretofore resigned for the purpose of retirement as an enlisted man," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That officers of the Philippine Scouts shall hereafter be retired under the same conditions as officers of the Regular Army, and shall then be placed on the unlimited retired list. Any former officer of the Philippine Scouts who vacated his office in the Philippine Scouts by discharge or resignation on account of disability incurred in line of duty, or when any such officer has heretofore resigned for the purpose of retirement as an enlisted man, may be reappointed to his former grade and then retired. Officers of the Philippine Scouts now on the retired list, or hereafter retired, shall receive the same pay as retired officers of like grades and length of service in the Regular Army. Hereafter retired officers of the Philippine Scouts shall be eligible for advancement in accordance with the last proviso of section 24 of the act of June 3, 1916.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF AND PROMOTION OF CERTAIN ARMY OFFICERS.

The bill (S. 2448) for the relief of certain officers of the United States Army, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

Mr. NEW. I hope the Senator will withhold that request for a moment, and permit me to say a word or two about this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold it for the Senator to make a statement.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, all the items in this bill have previously passed the Senate. They were inserted in the military appropriation bill which passed the Senate just before June 30, and were stricken out in conference by the House conferees solely on the ground that the House conferees did not want that kind of legislation attached to an appropriation bill. As I understand, there was no dispute whatever on the part of any of them as to the merits of any one of the items making up this measure. All of them passed the Senate after full consideration. They were included in this omnibus bill merely to overcome the objection that was made by the House conferees to their being considered on an appropriation bill, which, I think, is a valid objection, so far as that goes, but I hope the bill may be considered at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I understand, each of these claims has been examined and recommended by the department.

Mr. NEW. Every one of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have just read the balance of the bill, and see just what it provides. I notice that Mr. Barber was a lieutenant in the British Army, but was an American citizen.

Mr. NEW. No; that is not the fact. Does the Senator want information concerning that case?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I simply state that, as I understand, he was a lieutenant in the British Army when he lost his eyes.

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And yet he was an American citizen.

Mr. NEW. No.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if he was not an American citizen, why should we make this provision for him?

Mr. THOMAS. He was in the American service.

Mr. NEW. For this reason: I shall be very glad to make an explanation of that.

Barber was a lieutenant in the British Army. He was sent over here at the request of this Government to instruct our officers in the art of throwing hand grenades. We supplied the hand grenades to be used in his instruction. We gave him a defective hand grenade, and in the act of hurling that grenade it exploded prematurely, and this officer was instantly rendered totally and forever blind in the service of the United States Government. If ever there was an act of justice called for, it is that this officer be placed upon the pay roll of the United States Government for that reason.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator's statement clears up the matter entirely, and I have not any objection at all to the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frank Barber, a first lieutenant of the Dorset Regiment of Infantry of the British Army, who lost the sight of both eyes and became totally blind by reason of a premature explosion on February 14, 1918, while acting as an instructor of the United States troops at Camp Wheeler, Ga., as compensation for disability resulting therefrom, such sums of money as by the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, is provided to be paid as compensation for disability to an injured person who has lost both eyes or become totally blind from causes occurring in the line of duty in the service of the United States; and such compensation shall be payable and be paid as of and from the 14th day of February, 1918, and under and according to the terms, conditions, and basis of computation in said act provided, and such sum shall be in full of all claims, legal or equitable, of the said Frank Barber, his heirs, representatives, or assigns.

SEC. 2. Col. William A. Simpson: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, Col. William A. Simpson, United States Army, retired, to the position and rank of brigadier general on the retired list.

SEC. 3. Maj. H. W. Daley: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, Maj. H. W. Daley, National Army, to the position and rank of major on the retired list.

SEC. 4. Capt. Daniel W. Hand: That the name of Daniel W. Hand, now captain of Field Artillery, be placed on the lineal list of officers of Field Artillery in the position it would have occupied if he had not suffered the loss of rank announced in General Orders, No. 156, War Department, August 8, 1910; and the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Capt. Hand, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to the grade which such restored position on the lineal list requires, to be an additional number in the grade until absorbed, and no longer.

SEC. 5. Capt. Leonard F. Matlack: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate Capt. Leonard F. Matlack, now serving with the Eighth Cavalry, to the position and rank of captain on the retired list.

SEC. 6. Credit in the accounts of Col. Jesse McI. Carter: The accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to allow and credit in the accounts of Col. Jesse McI. Carter, Cavalry, United States Army, the sum of $352.23, disallowed against him on the books of the Treasury.

SEC. 7. Capt. J. C. Garrett: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, J. C. Garrett, formerly a captain of Cavalry, to take rank as if he had remained continuously in the service.

SEC. 8. Col. Samuel R. Jones: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be and he is hereby authorized to appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate Col. Samuel R. Jones United States Army retired to the position and rank of brigadier general on the retired list.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The bill (S. 170) to amend section 25 of the act of December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act of September 7, 1916, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the word "than," to strike out "one" and insert "five," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act of September 7, 1916, be amended by adding a subsection (a) to read as follows:

"SEC. 25a. That any member bank located in a city or incorporated town of more than 500,000 inhabitants and possessing a capital and surplus of $1,000,000 or more may, under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, establish branches, not to exceed 10 in number, within the corporate limits of the city or town in which it is located: Provided, That no such branch shall be established in any State in which neither State banks nor trust companies may lawfully establish branches."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS SEVY.

The bill (S. 428) for the relief of Thomas Sevy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to accept title to the following-described lands, either in whole or in part, upon certification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the lands are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes and approximately equal in value to the lands to be given in exchange therefor: The east half of section 32; the north half of the northwest quarter and the south half of the southwest quarter of section 32, township 35 south, range 4 west of Salt Lake base and meridian, situate in the Sevier National Forest; and to issue to Thomas Sevy in lieu thereof patents to the following-described areas, or to such parts thereof as are found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be approximately equal in value to the lands conveyed: The northeast quarter, the north half of the southeast quarter, the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter, the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter, and the southwest quarter of section 31, township 37 south, range 5 west of Salt Lake base and meridian: Provided, That the lands conveyed to the Government shall thereupon become parts of the Sevier National Forest and subject to all laws and regulations applicable thereto: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture shall jointly report to Congress, in detail, the factors upon which the valuations were made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN STATES LUMBER CO.

The bill (S. 577) for the relief of the Southern States Lumber Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the Southern States Lumber Co., a corporation, Pensacola, Fla., $603.79.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN WYOMING.

The bill (S. 420) providing for the extension of time for the reclamation of certain lands in the State of Wyoming under the Carey Act, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, within his discretion, to continue not beyond May 5, 1929, the segregation of lands embraced in approved Wyoming segregation list No. 22, under the Carey Act, and to continue not beyond June 10, 1929, the segregation of lands embraced in approved Wyoming segregation list No. 25, under the Carey Act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN ALBERT THOMPSON.

The bill (S. 2378) to authorize the issuance of patent to John Albert Thompson, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent for the west half of the northeast quarter of section 23, township 158 north, range 90 west of the fifth principal meridian, North Dakota, to John Albert Thompson, pursuant to his homestead entry 02022, Minot series.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to set aside and appropriate, in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of the act of June 17, 1902, entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for reclamation of arid lands," the sum of $120, which was paid by said Thompson as purchase price of the described land.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS IN FLORIDA.

The bill (S. 578) providing for the survey of public lands remaining unsurveyed in the State of Florida, with a view of satisfying the grant in aid of schools made to said State under the act of March 3, 1845, and other acts amendatory thereof, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be lawful for the properly credited agent or official of the State of Florida having in charge the adjustment of its school grant to apply to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the survey of any townships or parts of townships of public lands unsurveyed in any of the surveying districts of said State, with a view to satisfy the grant in aid of schools made to said State of Florida by the act of March 3, 1845, and other acts amendatory thereto to the extent of the full quantity of land called for thereby; and upon the application of said agent or official the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall proceed to have the survey or surveys so applied for made, as in the case of surveys of other public lands; and the lands that may be found to fall within the limits of such townships or parts of townships as ascertained by the survey shall be reserved, upon the filing of the application for survey, from any adverse appropriation by settlement or otherwise, except under rights that may be found to exist of prior inception, for a period to extend from such application for survey until the expiration of 60 days from date of filing of the township plat of survey in the proper district land office, during which period of 60 days the State may select any of such lands not embraced in any valid adverse claim for the satisfaction of its school grant, as aforesaid, with the condition, however, that the agent or official of the State, within 30 days from the date of such filing of the application for survey, shall cause a notice to be published, which publication shall be continued for 30 days from date of first publication in some newspaper of general circulation in the vicinity of the lands likely to be embraced in such townships or parts of townships giving notice to all parties interested of the fact of such application for survey and the exclusive right of selection by the State for the aforesaid period of 60 days as herein provided for, and after the expiration of such 60 days any lands which may remain unselected by the State and not otherwise appropriated according to law shall be subject to disposal under general laws as other public lands: Provided, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall give notice immediately of the reservation of any townships or parts of townships to the officials of the local land office of the land district in which the land is situated of the withdrawal of such townships or parts of townships for the purpose hereinbefore provided: Provided further, That the agent or official of the State of Florida hereinbefore mentioned is authorized to advance money from time to time for the survey of the township or townships, or part thereof withdrawn, at such United States depository as may be designated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the money so advanced shall be reimbursable.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMISSION ON HOUSE CONSTRUCTION AND HOME OWNERSHIP.

The bill (S. 168) to create a commission to investigate and report to Congress a plan on the questions involved in the financing of house construction and home ownership and Federal aid therefor was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SOLDIERS' MEMORIAL IN CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to employees of the United States Department of Agriculture who died in the war with Germany was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should not object to a joint resolution providing for the erection of a memorial to all the employees of the United States who died in the war with Germany, but this does not cover the ground to that extent, and I shall therefore ask to have it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

OMER G. PAQUET.

The bill (S. 2445) to permit the reenlistment of Omer G. Paquet in the United States Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit the reenlistment in the United States Army, at the grade held by him at the time of his dishonorable discharge from the service, of Omer Germain Paquet, formerly a quartermaster sergeant; and the said Omer Germain Paquet shall, for the purposes of computing continuous service, for ascertaining the rate at which he shall be paid, and for retirement, be considered to have served continuously from the date of his last enlistment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

ALBERT H. CAMPBELL.

The bill (S. 1637) for the relief of Albert H. Campbell was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Albert H. Campbell shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as captain of Company G, Fourteenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, on the 30th day of May, 1865.

Mr. CURTIS. The Committee on Military Affairs recommend an amendment to the bill. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no pension, pay, bounty, or allowance shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECREATION ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA.

The bill (S. 2224) to incorporate the Recreation Association of America was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

T. L. LOVE.

The bill (S. 358) carrying into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of the claim of T. L. Love, surviving partner of Robert Love & Son, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to T. L. Love, surviving partner of Robert Love & Son, of Wake County, N. C., the sum of $5,000, to satisfy the findings of the Court of Claims, certified to the President of the Senate January 26, 1915 (S. Doc. No. 851, 63d Cong., 3d sess).

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. FREDERICK B. SHAW.

The bill (S. 2343) for the relief of Capt. Frederick B. Shaw was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Frederick B. Shaw, United States Army, the sum of $356.50, said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be payment in full for all losses of personal property incurred by him by reason of the sinking of the U. S. transport Meade in the harbor of Ponce, P. I., on or about May 16, 1899. But the accounting officer of the Treasury shall require a schedule and affidavit from him, such schedule to be approved by the Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. LEA.

The bill (S. 2440) for the relief of the estate of John M. Lea, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the word "pay," to insert "in full settlement of the following claim," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, in full settlement of the following claim, to The Nashville Trust Co., administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of John M. Lea, deceased, late of Nashville, Tenn., the sum of $6,883.31, that being the amount found due by the Court of Claims for rents collected by the Quartermaster Department, United States Army, during the Civil War from the tenants of said John M. Lea, which rents were paid into the Treasury of the United States, as reported to Congress in Senate Document No. 48, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

V. E. SCHERMERHORN AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 1330) for the relief of V. E. Schermerhorn, E. C. Caley, G. W. Campbell, and Philip Hudspeth was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 7, after the name "Schermerhorn," to strike out "$6,250" and insert "$2,767.45"; and on page 2, line 3, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$7,592" and insert "$3,109.45," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to V. E. Schermerhorn, E. C. Caley, G. W. Campbell, and Philip Hudspeth, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the following sums: V. E. Schermerhorn, $2,767.45; E. C. Caley, $192; G. W. Campbell, $16; and Philip Hudspeth, $134, for the destruction, on October 15, 1908, of their property by fire, which occurred on the Fort Riley (Kans.) Military Reservation while Battery A, Sixth Field Artillery, was engaged in target practice near the northern boundary, and which spread to and caused serious damage to privately owned farms adjoining the reservation; and the sum of $3,109.45 is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH B. EDDY.

The bill (S. 2453) to carry into effect the finding of the Court of Claims in the claim of Elizabeth B. Eddy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Elizabeth B. Eddy, widow of Charles G. Eddy, of New York, N. Y., the sum of $602.92, and the said sum is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KATIE NORVALL.

The bill (S. 1546) for the relief of Katie Norvall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $10,000 as full compensation to Katie Norvall for the death of her husband, G. Norvall, who was drowned while engaged in the performance of his duties as fireman and engineer, as a result of a collision between the navy-yard launch Highlander and the ferryboat Vallejo near the Mare Island ferry slip, Vallejo, Calif.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to strike out, in line 6, page 1, the figures "$10,000" and to insert "$5,000."

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire how that would compare with the measure of compensation provided by the Federal compensation act? I am not sure what amount of compensation, under that act, the beneficiary would be entitled to. It seems to me we ought to conform to that act if possible.

Mr. THOMAS. I will state my purpose in offering the amendment is I am afraid of the precedent that would be set by the granting of such a large sum of money in a private bill of this sort. I moved the amendment without reference to the Federal compensation act.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think we ought to conform to that act. If we pass a bill, it seems to me the measure of damages allowed ought to be on the same basis that is there provided.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask the Senator from Colorado to withdraw his objection.

Mr. THOMAS. I will withdraw the objection at the request of the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, this is the case of a widow with several children, whose husband was drowned in San Francisco Bay through the carelessness of an agent of the Government. The amount, $10,000, I assume, is about right as compensation for the death of a husband in the service of the United States under such circumstances.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me to call attention to the report of the committee, which is, in line 6, to strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,173.12"? It seems that that is the basis upon which the bill is favorably reported.

Mr. PHELAN. But the bill itself appropriates $10,000 in full compensation.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN M. FRANCIS.

The bill (S. 176) for the relief of John M. Francis was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John M. Francis, father of late Cadet John C. Francis, West Point Military Academy, who died on duty at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., the sum of $181, burial and transportation expenses.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to know whether there is any precedent for the payment of this amount of money. It is the first bill I ever saw of the kind. I ask that it go over, without some explanation.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I know about the bill. This boy was a cadet at West Point, who was admitted in perfect health, and because of some conditions there he contracted tuberculosis. He was in the academy for about two years, and was sent to New Mexico to recuperate. The Government sent him there, as they would send a soldier. He was there several months and died. They sent his body home. His father is in very moderate circumstances, and it seemed to me that where the Government sent the body home they should pay for the cost of sending it home.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, many cadets have died at West Point and Annapolis, and I have never yet known of a bill to pay for the transportation of the body home, or to defray the expenses attached to it. If we undertake to do this, Mr. President, we had better pass a general law covering all cases of death. That is all I have in mind. It may be just, but I do not know of any such bill ever having passed the Senate.

Mr. CALDER. I do not, either, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest that the Senator let the bill go over, and then I will look it up and see about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

RINALD BROS.

The bill (S. 1456) for the relief of Rinald Bros., of Philadelphia, Pa., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Rinald Bros., of Philadelphia, Pa., the sum of $645, as an additional price for paint in excess of the amount named in the contract between Rinald Bros. and the Quartermaster's Department, at Philadelphia, for the year ending June 30, 1917.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF INDIAN APPROPRIATION ACT.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 77) to amend section 18 of the Indian appropriation act, approved June 30, 1919, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It amends the second paragraph in section 18 of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1919 (Public, No. 3, 66th Cong., p. 22), by adding after the last word in the proviso at the end of the paragraph the words "out of any funds in the Treasury to the credit of the Cherokee Nation."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOREST RESERVES IN NEW MEXICO.

The bill (S. 667) limiting the creation or extension of forest reserves in New Mexico was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, in line 5, after the words "limits of the," to strike out "State" and insert "States"; and in the same line, after the words "New Mexico," to insert "and Arizona," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter no forest reservation shall be created, nor shall any additions be made to one heretofore created, within the limits of the States of New Mexico and Arizona except by act of Congress.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to further amend that bill by inserting the words "and Colorado" after the words "and Arizona," in line 5.

Mr. SMOOT. Was not the word "Colorado" in the original act?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think so.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure it was.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am quite sure that the provision of the bill applies already to Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill limiting the creation or extension of forest reserves in New Mexico and Arizona."

APPOINTMENTS AT WEST POINT.

The bill (S. 2446) to amend section 1318, Revised Statutes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after the word "case," to insert "That during the calendar years 1919 and 1920"; on line 7, to strike out the words "any person" and insert "any appointee"; on line 9, after the word "in," to strike out "either"; on the same line, after the word "the," to strike out "volunteer or regular service" and insert "Army"; and on line 10, after the word "late," to strike out "European war" and insert "war with Germany," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1318, Revised Statutes, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows: "Appointees shall be admitted to the academy only between the ages of 17 and 22 years, except in the following case: That during the calendar years 1919 and 1920 any appointee who has served honorably and faithfully not less than one year in the Army of the United States in the late war with Germany, and who possesses the other qualifications required by law, may be admitted between the ages of 17 and 24 years."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUARTERS FOR COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

The bill (S. 2623) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide quarters or commutation thereof to commissioned officers in certain cases," approved April 16, 1918, was announced as next in order.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the termination of the emergency mentioned in an act entitled "An act to provide quarters or commutation thereof to commissioned officers in certain cases," approved April 16, 1918, the provisions of the said act shall be applicable to every commissioned officer of the Army of the United States who is assigned to duty at a place where suitable public quarters are not available for himself and dependents, and who is not entitled to commutation of quarters under any other provision of existing law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRAVEL ALLOWANCES OF ENLISTED MEN.

The bill (S. 2624) to provide travel allowances for certain retired enlisted men and Regular Army reservists was announced as next in order.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 126 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, as amended by section 3 of an act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1919, shall be held to apply to any enlisted man for whom the law authorizes travel allowances as an incident to entry upon and relief from active duty with the Army who has been called into active service during the present emergency, or who shall hereafter be called into active service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2676) to amend section 56 of an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2677) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade and technical schools and universities, other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over. This concludes the calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SANTA FE, N. MEX.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, this morning made a favorable report on Senate bill 681, and it is now on the calendar. It is purely a formal matter. The Senate passed a similar bill at the last session of Congress, and it does not involve any appropriation. I ask unanimous consent to take it up for consideration at this time.

It relates to an appropriation made several years ago for a public building in the city of Santa Fe, N. Mex. The wording of the appropriation act required that the building should be constructed so as to include a courthouse, with provision for holding court in the public building. There is a Federal building now in use in Santa Fe which accommodates the Federal court, and the Federal judge and other court officials and all people who are acquainted with the conditions want to have the law modified so that the building shall not be required to be constructed in such fashion as to accommodate the court, but that it shall be for the post office and other public purposes.

There are a good many other public activities in the city of Santa Fe which are being accommodated through the renting of private properties. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session but failed to receive attention in the House. There is no objection to it from any source that I have ever heard of, and it should be passed in order to enable the Treasury Department to proceed with the construction of the building in Santa Fe.

Mr. THOMAS. Let the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That so much of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 875), as authorized the erection of a building for the accommodation of the post office and United States courts at Santa Fe, N. Mex., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to require that said building shall be for the accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices, exclusive of the United States courts.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator whether it will be possible to have an executive session to-day?

Mr. CURTIS. I think not to-day.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is important that the nominations of members of the Shipping Board shall be acted upon to-day, if possible. Does the Senator think we can have an executive session for that purpose on Monday?

Mr. CURTIS. There are several Senators interested in the matter who were informed that at this time, on the conclusion of the consideration of the calendar, there would be an adjournment without an executive session. For that reason I think it better to let the matter go over until Monday. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 4, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 2, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee that measures are being put into practice to alleviate the unparalleled conditions existing in our country; that the authorities will look into them with a view of cutting down the high cost of living and profiteering in all branches; that the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness may be realized in getting back to the normal; that good government may obtain in all the conditions of life. In the name of truth and right and justice. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. STEENERSON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. STEENERSON. To make a privileged motion.

Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I make a privileged motion to change the reference of a certain bill which I have here for the adjudication of private claims, which was referred to our committee. We considered it, and I have been directed to move a change of reference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves a change of reference of a bill, which he sends to the Clerk's desk and which will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4738) for the adjudication and determination of the claims arising under joint resolution of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. L., p. 670), authorizing the Postmaster General to continue to use in the Postal Service Marcus P. Norton's combined postmarking and stamp-canceling hand-stamp patents, and directing him to "determine upon a fair, just, and equitable compensation for the use of said inventions"; or arising otherwise.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. STEENERSON. To refer it to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. Where is it now?

Mr. STEENERSON. In the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the bill reported be transferred from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to the Committee on Claims. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reference of the bill H. R. 1186 to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be vacated and that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up the bill to be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1186) to confer certain additional powers upon the Federal Trade Commission, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to change the reference from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the reference in the first instance was correct, inasmuch as the bill relates to the increase of the powers in the Federal Trade Commission in the matter of granting licenses to corporations doing interstate-commerce business. The Federal Trade Commission was created by an act which passed through our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the matter of granting licenses is connected with interstate commerce. However, our committee took action on this matter yesterday, and in view of the rather peculiar circumstances surrounding our committee at the present time and our desire not to delay consideration of the measure by some other committee, we do not object to its reference, with the understanding that it shall not be considered as a precedent hereafter of taking from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce any matter relating to the Federal Trade Commission or the powers it exercises.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I, as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, wish my position to be clearly understood with respect to this reference. This matter is essentially and inherently within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Federal Trade Commission, as stated by the distinguished chairman, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], was elaborately considered and reported by that committee, and the subject of the reference essentially relates to the jurisdiction of that committee. But in view of the statement of the chairman of the committee I offer no objection, but I do wish to emphasize his contention that this reference is not to be considered as a precedent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The reference is ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 80. Joint resolution to authorize the President to convene the first meeting of the international labor conference in Washington, and to appoint delegates thereto.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 3854) for the repeal of the daylight-saving law.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 26.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the action taken under concurrent resolution of July 28, 1919, providing for an adjournment of the House from Saturday, the 2d day of August, until 12 o'clock meridian, Tuesday, the 9th day of September, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 80. Joint resolution to authorize the President to convene a meeting of an international labor conference in Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

BRIDGE ACROSS FLINT RIVER, GA.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 7110.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. PARK. It is a bridge bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7110) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across Flint River, in the State of Georgia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by act of Congress approved April 17, 1916, to be built across the Flint River, Ga., by Mitchell County or by Baker County, Ga., jointly or separately, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to start in on bridge bills with the measures that are now pending.

Mr. PARK. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold it a moment.

Mr. PARK. It will not take a minute.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his objection. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PARK, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAYMENT FOR MILITARY CONSTRUCTION WORK.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to call up House joint resolution 165, a resolution containing about five lines.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to inquire what this joint resolution is about.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent has not been given yet. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report. After it has been reported, objection can be made.

The Clerk read the title of H. J. Res. 165, to allow the payment of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 7, 66th Cong., H. R. 5227).

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. This joint resolution is simply to cure a mistake that was made when the other bill was passed, is it not?

Mr. McKENZIE. In putting the limitation in the Army appropriation bill we intended to prevent the further expenditure of money in the purchase of real estate or construction in various camps and cantonments, but we did not intend to prevent the payment for work performed or material delivered prior to that time; but the Comptroller of the Treasury has made a ruling that the limitation extends to work performed and material delivered prior to that time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This is to cure that?

Mr. McKENZIE. This cures that.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if this is to cure the construction of the so-called limitation upon the purchase of real estate in the Army bill?

Mr. McKENZIE. If the real estate had been purchased and the contract completed prior to the passage of the bill, they would be permitted to pay for it, and in my judgment that should be permitted; but if the contract had not been completed, then they are barred under the limitation.

Mr. WALSH. What does the gentleman mean by a completed contract for real estate? Down here at Camp Benning or somewhere they purchased a large tract while that measure was under consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE. And paid for it.

Mr. WALSH. So this would not apply to that in any event?

Mr. McKENZIE. No.

Mr. ASWELL. Reserving the right to object, what effect would this have upon a contract already signed by the War Department for the construction of a road to a camp, which road is now under process of construction but not yet paid for?

Mr. McKENZIE. If it is inside of a military reservation, it would not be affected by this legislation at all.

Mr. ASWELL. But it is not.

Mr. McKENZIE. The purpose of this bill is to permit the Government to pay a great many business men who have really performed their work and delivered the goods and are now being held up by this ruling of the comptroller.

Mr. ASWELL. This road is at a base hospital that is being used by the Public Health Service. Now, the contract has been signed and the work is in progress. What effect will this have on that?

Mr. McKENZIE. If anything this joint resolution would assist those parties rather than injure them.

Mr. OLIVER. What bill does the comptroller construe as forbidding the payment?

Mr. McKENZIE. The limitation that was placed on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. OLIVER. When was that passed?

Mr. McKENZIE. The 11th day of July.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, what effect will this resolution have upon that land attempted to be purchased down in Georgia, which contract was made after the adjournment of the last Congress? Will it permit them to go ahead with that contract?

Mr. McKENZIE. It will not, without further authorization from Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say that it is probably necessary to pass this joint resolution, but in the report appears this statement:

The Comptroller of the Treasury in passing on this limitation has held erroneously, in the judgment of the committee, that work and construction performed or materials delivered prior to the date of the passage of this act could not be paid for out of any of the unexpended balances.

I hardly think that statement is correct, and I do not think it ought to be allowed to go through without notation. I do not think the committee meant to hold that the judgment of the comptroller was erroneous in this regard. Personally I think that the judgment of the comptroller was correct, and that the War Department unlawfully expended that money, and even now have no right to spend a dollar of the money that we appropriated for war by using it for peace-time construction, which they are now doing. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that men who delivered material and did work have an equitable claim and should get their money, but I do not believe we ought to say that the comptroller erred in making what I consider to be an absolutely sound ruling.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that if there is any blame connected with the Military Affairs Committee in that connection it rests wholly with me.

Mr. KITCHIN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if it would not be more equitable to strike out the word "delivered" and substitute the words "actually produced under the contract of purchase"? That carries out what the gentleman wants, does it not? The joint resolution reads:

That the foregoing provisions of said act shall not be construed to prevent the payment from the unexpended balances of said appropriations of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of said act.

Now, that confines it to the goods that were purchased and actually delivered over to the Government, and it leaves out those cases where the Government purchased, and the contractors actually produced under the contract exactly what was contracted for, but had not actually delivered it. Take shoes, for instance. The Government, say, actually purchased so many shoes and the manufacturer actually produced the shoes under the contract, but had not bodily delivered them. Or take lumber, for instance. Here is a bill of lumber which has been purchased, and the lumber has been manufactured and produced under that contract of purchase, but has not been actually delivered. Now, why should not that lumberman have his bill paid as well as the lumberman who had actually delivered the lumber? I would suggest that, in order to cover all the equities where one actually produced articles under a contract of purchase although he has not delivered it, we strike out the words "and delivered" and insert "actually produced under the contract." Would not that be more fair?

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that that was discussed in the committee, and we decided that we would take care of such cases when there was absolutely no question as to whether the goods had been delivered and the work performed, but that we would not open the doors to any doubtful contract or permit men to come in under this bill with questionable contracts, realizing that if a man has a just claim it would be taken care of—if a man has such a claim that the gentleman speaks of it will be taken care of. The price of lumber and shoes and everything that can be thought of, instead of going down from the time the man made the contract, unless he had a most unconscionable contract, has been going up, so that he can get more now than he could under his contract.

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose he had lumber of special dimensions that he could not put on the market. He has actually produced it, every foot of it, under the contract of purchase. Why should not that man have his pay?

Mr. McKENZIE. I appreciate what the gentleman says, but we felt that it would be unwise at this time to go into that.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The class of cases mentioned by the gentleman from North Carolina, the shoe men and the lumbermen, although they may have prepared material for delivery to the United States Government, they still have the materials and ought not to be paid for them until the Government gets them. There is no claim against the Government for this material; they can sell it to people who want it and are ready for it.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas raised the question that the pending resolution in fact seeks to legalize and provide payment for illegal contracts. Did the committee go into that question?

Mr. McKENZIE. It did not.

Mr. OLIVER. You are not seeking, then, to legalize that which the committee was informed was illegal, and the ruling of the comptroller was not based on the illegality of the contracts, but solely because of limitations contained in the July 11 act. Is not that correct?

Mr. McKENZIE. I so understand.

Mr. GARRETT. Further reserving the right to object, I want to say this in justice to those of us who argued this question when it was up before. I agree with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] that the construction the comptroller placed on this matter was the correct construction, and several of us justified our position in opposition to the limitation that the Military Affairs Committee sought to place on the bill, and justified our position of opposition to the resolution that the Rules Committee reported to make it in order after it had gone out on a point of order under the general rules of the House, upon the very theory that the comptroller has sustained because we construed the law that way. It was because I felt, for one, that it would affect these very contracts which it is now sought to relieve by this resolution that I opposed the proposition as submitted by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

House joint resolution 165.

To allow the payment of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public No. 7, Sixty-sixth Congress, H. R. 5227).

Whereas by an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public No. 7, Sixty-sixth Congress, H. R. 5227), it is provided as follows:

"That no part of any of the appropriations made herein nor any of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the Army or the Military Establishment shall be expended for the purchase of real estate for the construction of Army camps or cantonments except in such cases at National Army or National Guard camps or cantonments which were in use prior to November 11, 1918, where it has been or may be found more economical to the Government for the purpose of salvaging such camps or cantonments to buy real estate than to continue to pay rentals or claims for damages thereon, and except where industrial plants have been constructed or taken over by the Government for war purposes and the purchase of land is necessary in order to protect the interest of the Government"; and

Whereas doubt exists as to the proper interpretation of said provision and as to the intention of Congress in enacting the same: Therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the foregoing provision of said act shall not be construed to prevent the payment from the unexpended balances of said appropriations of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of said act.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, in order to clarify what I said a moment ago. I did not catch all that was said by the gentleman from Kansas. My attention has been directed to the fact that he stated that he thought there was no legal right to make the contracts originally. In view of that fact, and that I stated that I agreed with the gentleman from Kansas on the construction made by the comptroller, I wish to correct that statement. I do not agree that they had no authority to make the contract. I think they did. I agree that the ruling of the comptroller was correct. I do not understand that the comptroller placed it on the ground mentioned by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. As I caught the reading of the resolution, it has a long preamble and a short legislative provision. I suppose it was drawn in the department.

Mr. McKENZIE. It was.

Mr. MANN. If they were familiar with legislative proceedings, as they ought to be, they would know that it is not a proper method to refer to the preamble to know what the legislation is. It is customary to strike out the preamble after the consideration. The legislation here depends wholly on the preamble, which is not in the legislative provision.

Mr. McKENZIE. This is simply a construction of the act.

Mr. MANN. It is not a construction; it is legislation. It is repealing a part of an act of Congress and does it by reference to the preamble.

Mr. McKENZIE. I can not exactly agree with my distinguished colleague.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has read the resolution—and of course he has very carefully—he must realize that it refers to the preamble. That is the only place where the act is described.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKENZIE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

INVESTIGATION OF UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD—LEGAL ASSISTANCE.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 209.

Resolved, That the select committee, appointed under the provisions of House resolution 171, to make inquiry into the operations of the United States Shipping Board, the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, or any agency, branch, or subsidiary of either, is hereby authorized to employ such stenographic, legal, and clerical assistance, including accountants, as it may deem necessary, and is further authorized to have such printing and binding done as it may require.

All expenses incurred by the said committee under the provisions of House Resolution 171, including expenses when sitting outside the District of Columbia, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers, ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this resolution follows the one which was offered some days ago by the Committee on Rules. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to make a short statement in respect to it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask some gentleman who feels capable of answering the question, what this committee wants with a lawyer? The whole committee is made up of lawyers.

Mr. IRELAND. If the gentleman will very graciously withhold that question for a moment, I would state that that is what I have in mind in yielding to the gentleman from Massachusetts. That was the point in the committee, and the only point of contention.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What do they want with lawyers to help this committee?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I expected that question might be asked, and I stated to the Committee on Accounts in presenting the resolution that it is not the intention of the special committee to retain an attorney to conduct the examination for the committee in questioning and cross-questioning the witnesses before that committee, but in view of the great number of contracts, leases, and other legal documents that have been drawn and signed, in many cases involving questions of maritime law, the committee felt that it might be necessary to employ a lawyer to examine the documents for the committee and to present such as he felt necessary to the committee with his interpretation, to assist the committee in examining the large number of contracts, leases, and other documents.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If they are going to hire a lawyer, what is the committee going to do? What are they good for?

Mr. WALSH. The committee will be busy enough in conducting the examination into this very important department of the Government, which has been very active during the last three or four years; in fact, since its creation and establishment. The committee, of course, will have to hold hearings and hear the statements of a great many officials and people who have been connected with transactions in the activities of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. These appointments on these committees are highly honorable and gentlemen like to get them. The members of this committee, almost without exception, are good lawyers.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman, although he does say "almost without exception."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And these committees go to work usually and hire some high-class city lawyer, and the country lawyers, although they are the best lawyers in the world, never get a look-in on any of these appointments to act as attorneys. We have been talking a great deal here about economy, and, of course, I suppose this lawyer, whoever he may be, will get $15,000, for that seems to be about the minimum figure.

Mr. WALSH. That was the precedent established by the majority party in the last Congress, I will say.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not care who established it. The committee does not have to follow precedents.

Mr. WALSH. No; and I do not think that that precedent will be followed, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I want to know is, if this would not be a good time to save even as small an amount as $15,000?

Mr. WALSH. A very good time, I think.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am in favor of it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If it be true, and I have no doubt that it is, that all of the members of this committee are very eminent lawyers——

Mr. WALSH. "Almost without exception," the gentleman from Missouri says.

Mr. LONGWORTH. "Almost without exception," are there any members of the committee who know anything, or practically anything, about admiralty law?

Mr. WALSH. I think not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And, therefore, the employment of such an attorney is necessary. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is talking about the precedents set by the majority party in the last Congress. I think some of those precedents are very bad. Yesterday we struck the lawyers from the resolution for the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department. Why not do the same thing with this?

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman appreciates the fact that the Shipping Board has been operating a vast number of plants under contracts and arrangements and leases, and has been operating ships under arrangements which have necessitated the drafting of legal documents involving many questions of maritime law. It would seem that it might become necessary for an attorney to make an examination of many of those legal documents and to assist the committee in construing them for the purpose of conducting the thorough examination which will be required and which it is, of course, expected the special committee will make into the affairs of the Shipping Board, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and any other subsidiary organizations connected with it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Is it the purpose of this investigating committee to have the publicity agent of the Republican national committee present to make notes or take notes?

Mr. WALSH. It is not the purpose to have the publicity agent of the Republican national committee on the pay roll of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Has Creel got a job? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ASWELL) there were—ayes 105, noes 43.

So the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. IRELAND, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 224.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives compensation at the rate of $150 per month during the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress for the services of one clerk to each of the following-named committees: Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Interior, Committee on Railways and Canals, and Committee on Education.

Compensation for the clerks to the said committees to commence from the time such clerk entered upon the discharge of his duties, such time to be ascertained and evidenced by a certificate signed by the chairman of the said committee.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to state to the House that these clerks that are provided for in this resolution were those omitted in the last resolution brought in, because these chairmen had not appeared before the committee and given reason why they should be granted.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman know whether any of these committees have had a meeting this Congress?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; several, I think, have. I can not tell just which ones or how many meetings they have had, but they gave us the assurance——

Mr. ASWELL. Has the Committee on Railways and Canals had a meeting this session?

Mr. IRELAND. The chairman is here, and I can not recall what his answer was as to——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will yield for a brief question, does not the gentleman know that the Committee on Railways and Canals has not had a bill for five years and do not do any investigating?

Mr. IRELAND. We heard otherwise from the chairman of the committee when he appeared before us.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will look up the record he will find that that committee has had no business and I do not think they have had a clerk or have done any business.

Mr. IRELAND. The same committee had a clerk under the Democratic Congress, however. I do not know whether they have had any business or not.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit, I desire to state that the Committee on Education has no clerk and it has had a great many hearings and a great many meetings. We need a clerk for that committee, I know.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the gentleman is right in that.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the Committee on Education should have a clerk, but why on earth should $150 a month be paid to a clerk to the Committee on Railways and Canals when we know that the business it did all of last session was to have about three meetings? It has very little business, and the service of a clerk is wholly unnecessary, and I dare say the committee will not have a meeting this whole session, not just the first session but during the whole of the Sixty-sixth Congress, and there will be no necessity whatever for a clerk, so what is the use of spending the money? I was a member of this committee last year. We had three meetings, from which no legislation whatever resulted, and I do not know of any business during the whole of the Sixty-fifth Congress that necessitated a clerk for that committee.

Mr. IRELAND. But the committee had a clerk, however, did it not?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, it had a clerk, but it should not have had one. Merely because this side of the House provided one is no excuse for having one.

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly not. But the gentleman must recall, though, we should profit by Democratic mistakes——

Mr. BLANTON. That was an instance where we followed a bad precedent set by our Republican friends.

Mr. IRELAND. Very possibly. I am not sure about that. We have the assurance of the chairman that he has sufficient work before the committee to necessitate the employment of a clerk. Now, we can hardly go back of that assurance until proven otherwise.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My information is that that committee will have a considerable amount of work to do this year. I understand that an investigation is to be undertaken as to the difference in cost of transportation by canal and railway, which would be a very important investigation and could scarcely be conducted unless the committee had a clerk.

Mr. IRELAND. I understand there is quite a comprehensive case coming from the State of Ohio.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I just want to call attention to the fact that a clerk was provided by this resolution for the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department. I made that statement yesterday, that the committee had theretofore taken such action and the House will remember that it was denied. Now, we provided one in this resolution, and had already taken this action providing for a clerk for the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department before the other resolution, which was considered and debated here yesterday, was taken up, and I ask the chairman if he will not confirm that as being the fact?

Mr. IRELAND. It is absolutely the fact, and the only reason it was not handed in before was they brought in several separate bills.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then my statement was correct when I stated that the committee had already provided for it?

Mr. IRELAND. In that particular; yes, sir.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. GARD. I would like to be informed who is chairman of what has heretofore been a very unimportant committee. Who is chairman of it now?

Mr. IRELAND. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman say there is business before his committee that requires the services of a clerk?

Mr. IRELAND. I have been so informed.

Mr. GARD. My observation of the Committee on Railways and Canals is that they never had but one bill in the last Congress. I do not know what they have now, and I should like to have a word from the gentleman from Illinois as to how many bills they have before that committee.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHEELER. I will state that in the last Congress we held extensive hearings, and we had a number of meetings of that committee in the minority room in the House Office Building. We had 150 people from Indiana and Ohio on canal projects who represented the business men's associations from those States. In this Congress there has been introduced a resolution or two on which we will have hearings, and there has been one resolution introduced providing for surveying for a canal in Florida, and I am informed by the gentleman that introduced that resolution there will be some business men from that State that will want to come before that committee. And I have been informed that in all probability there will be a bill introduced for a canal project in Ohio and Indiana, and possibly Pennsylvania. If so, it will require hearings, and we will have quite a number of business men before the committee.

Mr. GARD. How many bills are now pending?

Mr. WHEELER. There are two before the committee now and in all probability there will be two more.

Mr. GARD. Two?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. For what length of time does the resolution contemplate the employment of these clerks?

Mr. IRELAND. Only during the first session of this Congress.

Mr. OLIVER. It appears from the questions asked, and from the information before the committee, that the business of these committees will be rather spasmodic. Would it not be better to authorize the appointment of a clerk only for the time a committee actually needs one?

Mr. IRELAND. That might have been a better method.

Mr. OLIVER. Rather than provide for the appointment of a clerk for 12 months?

Mr. IRELAND. That privilege, as we have always found, has been abused, and the compensation is usually about $6 a day, or $180 a month. A compromise was suggested by the gentleman from Georgia at $150 a month.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman will recall that when this matter was before the House at the last session clerks were refused to these same committees, and my recollection is that we authorized some other committees to employ clerks only for such time as the committees might certify they were needed.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLIVER. Now, would it not be better to amend your resolution so as to provide for certification by the chairmen of these respective committees that a clerk is needed for the time he is to be actually employed.

Mr. IRELAND. Well, that is a debatable question. We acted as we thought best under the circumstances. We found that most any arrangement that might be made would be capable of abuse at any time.

Mr. OLIVER. That certainly would be the business way of handling a matter of this kind, since it clearly appears that many of these committees have had but little, if any, work in the past and even now contemplate but a little work for the future.

Mr. IRELAND. Personally I am in accord with the gentleman's views.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. I am a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. They have had only one meeting. I did not know that the committee was asking for a clerk. I would like to ask the gentleman to have the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department explain to this House the necessity for a clerk for that committee.

Mr. KREIDER. I will be glad to explain.

Mr. CANNON. Is that matter up before the House now? Is it included in this resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. I asked permission to appoint my secretary as clerk without pay, and that stands; and, as I explained to the committee, I did not intend that the clerk to be appointed to that committee should receive any compensation whatever unless the committee should be compelled to have hearings and get such an amount of business that my clerk could not do the work. As long as my secretary does the work there will be no charges and no bill presented for the appointment of any clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

Mr. IRELAND. I will say that that statement was made before the committee.

Mr. KREIDER. It is not my intention now to appoint a clerk with pay. The clerk there now gets no pay, and unless that work is of such a volume that the clerk can not do it, there will be no clerk hire.

Mr. HOWARD. Why create the right to appoint this clerk unless something comes before the committee that makes it necessary?

Mr. IRELAND. Because the gentleman, who is more conversant with the work of the committee than the gentleman making the interrogatory, assures us there is business coming before the committee. The clerk will not be appointed until there is such business to occupy the time of the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, we are now having the annual round-up about these clerks for the minor committees. I wish to make a remark or two about this Committee on Railways and Canals. The Speakers have held that it fell into what

Mr. Cleveland would have called "innocuous desuetude." I do not know what the experience of the present Speaker has been about referring bills to that committee, but at the first of the last Congress I made up my mind I was going to either have the committee abolished or resurrected. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors had absorbed one half of its jurisdiction and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had absorbed the other half, and there were a good many bills introduced that ought to have gone to the Committee on Railways and Canals. And I concluded, as it had nothing to do I would give them something to do, if they would do it. So I went to the chairman of the committee and told him I would refer to his committee all the bills over which they had jurisdiction if he would agree to get his committee together and go to work. He said he would do it. Consequently I referred bills to them, and I have never heard a word about those bills from that day to this. [Laughter.] But there are bills that ought to go to the committee. There is a bill pending here—I do not know what committee it is in now—for digging a canal from Pittsburgh to Cleveland, or to some place up there on the lake, that is a very important and serious proposition. If that canal were dug it would be a great benefit to the commerce of that part of the country.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not the fact that the committee failed to report any legislation after considering the matters which the Speaker laid before it the best proof of the good judgment of the committee rather than otherwise?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My own judgment about it is that all these bills that are referred to committees ought to be reported back here some way or other, either favorably or unfavorably. That is the answer to that question.

Mr. MANN. It would make a lot of reports.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know there would be a lot of reports, but the committee has got nothing to do but make a report.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. I would like to have two or three minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I think this resolution ought to pass. I know that the Committee on Railways and Canals has some important business that may come before it.

But that is not what I took the floor to say. I am the chairman of one of the most important committees of this House and one of the hardest-working committees of the House. When it did business it did it promptly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. You had the girls to help you. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. No. We had no help from the girls. We did not require it with such able assistance as there was in the House. I have not asked the Committee on Accounts for a clerk for the Committee on Woman Suffrage. I have had my own clerk perform those duties. My clerk is the best clerk in the Capitol at Washington. [Applause.] She has been representing my district in Congress for the last two years, and may for some time to come. [Laughter.] Her salary for years was a good deal more than she is now getting, and I do not promise that I shall not ask the Committee on Accounts before the termination of this Congress that they allow enough additional to make her salary what it was and what it has been for years. I do not know whether I shall ask it or not. It would not be very much.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for just a few minutes?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Just a word, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the expenditure committees and their clerks. The expenditure committees ought in every session of Congress to be active. They have duties to perform that are important; not necessarily in the nature of investigations with a view of discovering something questionable, but investigations for the information of the House as to the conduct of the public business. These committees, every one of them, should be active enough to require the services of a good clerk. In this House the Committee on Accounts has insisted, before recommending clerks to these committees, that the committees urge the appointment of such clerks and bring evidence before the Committee on Accounts as to the intention of the committees to proceed to the work that properly falls to them and comes under their jurisdiction. Ordinarily these clerks are provided for as a matter of course at the beginning of the session. The Accounts Committee delayed making provision for these clerks until assured that the committees were going to do business. It is the duty of all of these committees to proceed to inquiries and investigations that will require the services of a good clerk. I am confident they will do so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; on this subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I agree with the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], that if the Committee on Railways and Canals is not busy, it ought to get busy, because one of the most important problems before the country to-day in connection with the high cost of living problem is the matter of transportation.

I have heard it said repeatedly during the last couple of years that one great phase of the transportation question to give effective relief to the people was the proper coordination of canals and the railways of the United States. One of the most effective methods by which rapid and cheap transportation should be effected would be the more effective utilization of our canals and waterways and railroads.

The other day I listened to a Member of Congress from Texas, who said that he had raised hundreds of bushels of tomatoes on his farm in Texas, and when they were sent to market and he got his account back from the commission merchant, instead of there being a profit, he was charged $2.50 as a handling expense; the people of the United States are wondering why it is that the farmer gets so little while it costs so much at the table, and one important phase of this situation is transportation. Germany tackled this question 50 years ago, and her best minds were directed to the utilization of the natural waterways of the country in conjunction with the railroads.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. I think if we are going to have the cost of living discussed under a resolution to provide a clerk to a committee, you had better have a quorum here. There are important measures pending here. Under a privileged resolution concerning a clerk, the gentleman is discussing the high cost of living, and I do not think we ought to permit absent Members to lose the benefit of this discussion.

Mr. IRELAND. I did not yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman said he was going to discuss the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said I was, and I ask the House for leave to address it for three minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know what the resolution is?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The resolution calls for the appointment of a clerk for the Committee on Railways and Canals, and I think it should pass; and if I were not interrupted I think I would have given cogent reasons why this committee, instead of being moribund, should be one of the most active in the House, to the benefit of the people of the country.

Mr. WALSH. And they would not have to have a clerk under this resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Years ago the railroads throttled the canals, and it looks now as though the railroads still had influence enough to stifle canal development, which would be of inestimable service to the people of the country.

While I am on the floor I want to make a statement about the housing conditions here in Washington. I am told that the Government took over quite a lot of land to build small houses for Government employees, particularly those employed in the navy yard. The war ended before the buildings were started, though some money was expended by the Government in building cellars and clearing off the land in many places. I was told to-day that there are a number of employees in the navy yard here who would like to buy this land at the price paid by the Government and build their own homes. These men are now inadequately housed, living two or three families in a house, with 6, 8, or 10 persons trying to live under insanitary conditions, and they have clubbed together enough money to build a substantial number of houses on this land, provided the Housing Bureau will turn it over to them at the original cost to the Government. This the Housing Bureau hesitates to do because of the fear of criticism by Congress. I think I can say to this commission that if these men, who are now improperly housed, are willing to pay the Government for the original cost of this land and build their own buildings, that this Congress to a man will stand behind that proposition. I am told that the money spent on this land by the Government does not help the land in any respect as far as these men are concerned; in fact, in many cases it would be a hindrance, because the cellars that were dug are altogether too large for the small buildings they intend to build. I thought that I ought to bring this matter to the attention of the House to see if there was any opposition, so that the members of the Housing Commission would feel that if they permit this sale to go on that they would have the indorsement of this body.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, at what time would it be in order to offer amendments to this resolution?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order now.

Mr. KITCHIN rose.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BLANTON. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to offer an amendment?

Mr. IRELAND. I have already yielded to the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. IRELAND. Two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope no gentleman on this side of the House will object to this resolution. I have conferred with the Democratic members of the Committee on Accounts and they favor the reporting of this resolution in its present shape. I understand that they looked over the Republican personnel of the committees asking for clerical assistance very carefully, and the Democrats came to the conclusion that if such committees were really going to amount to anything they would have to have outside assistance to get along. [Laughter.] I am pretty sure they do, and they ought to do some work; and being absolutely in need of outside assistance to do it, I hope no Member on this side will object to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. IRELAND. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROPOSED ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a motion which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of an order which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That until further notice the House shall meet at noon on Tuesdays and Fridays. No business shall be in order except the Chaplain's prayer, the reading and approval of the Journal, the signing of bills and resolutions on the Speaker's table, and a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. IGOE. Reserving the right to object, I had a resolution pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, relating to the investigation of the price of shoes and other articles, which has been reported with amendments. Before introducing it I requested the consent of the majority leader for its consideration, and he was not disposed to give that consent. This resolution is now pending on the calendar, and the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. DENISON] would like to have unanimous consent for its consideration. I have asked the Rules Committee to provide a rule in the event that unanimous consent is refused. I do not know what action will be taken upon that resolution, and until it is passed by the House I shall object to any such order as that suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 2847. An act providing additional aid for the American Printing House for the Blind;

H. R. 5228. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Minneapolis, a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River;

H. R. 5648. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Rainy River between Spooner, Minn., and Rainy River, Province of Ontario, Canada;

H. R. 6434. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River about 2 miles above its confluence with the Washita River, near Preston, Grayson County, Tex.;

H. R. 6342. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River at the town of Usk, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 6438. An act authorizing the counties of Aiken, S. C., and Richmond, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Augusta, Ga.;

H. R. 6450. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department, approved September 2, 1914,' as amended";

H. R. 6692. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the White River at or near Forsyth, Mo.;

H. R. 6805. An act to authorize the county of Dougherty, State of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Flint River, connecting Broad Street, in the city of Albany, said State and county, with the Isabella Road, said county and State; and

H. R. 5418. An act increasing the pay of printers and pressmen employed in the Government Printing Office, and for other purposes.

LABORATORY GLASSWARE, SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS, ETC.

On motion of Mr. FORDNEY the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7785) to provide revenue for the Government, to establish and maintain in the United States the manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, scientific and surgical instruments, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield such time as the gentleman from North Carolina wishes, not exceeding one hour.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] five minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I take it this bill is the opening gun in the battle for a general increase of the tariff. It is doubtless the precursor of many more bills that we may reasonably expect will follow. We have upon the table in front of us a splendid array of surgical instruments. Yesterday we were delightfully entertained by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] with an imposing exhibit of chemical and scientific glassware. I presume later in the session we will have demonstrations of the magnificent work done by the steel industry, by the brick industry, by the paper industry, and by the thousand and one industries of this country which have been clamoring for increased tariffs, to raise the protective wall to the absurd height which it had attained before the barrier was cut down, after repeated failures, I might add, on the part of the Republicans to keep their promise to lower it.

Gentlemen, the issue that confronts us to-day is the increased cost of living. How in the name of heaven are you going to accomplish anything in the way of reducing the high cost of living if you set out on the path to increase the cost of everything to the consumer? [Applause.]

It may be that the surgical instrument, the chemical laboratory, and glassware industries were stimulated by the force of necessity during the war. I do not deny that they have accomplished great things, and it may be that they ought to receive some encouragement to prevent their industries from being put out of business; but I tell you it is not the right way to do it by piecemeal. Get all of these bills together that you have pending now in your committee that relate to the tariff and give them careful consideration, and bring out a bill, not with tariff rates of 45 or 60 per cen ad valorem, as you do in this bill, but giving power to some intelligent commission to take into consideration the conditions and circumstances of the trade, industry, and occupation, the necessities of the moment, and to fix a tariff at a fair rate. I sincerely hope that you will not now start upon this road of bringing in these bills by piecemeal. If American industry needs encouragement, by all means give it intelligently. Do not take the word of the manufacturers that they need 60 per cent ad valorem in order to protect their industries, to prevent their being ruined by competition. One will demand 45 per cent, another 60 per cent, another, perhaps, will demand 80 per cent ad valorem. You should not be guided by their demands. [Applause.]

Their judgment is biased. They are governed by self-interest and not by any deep concern, either for the wage earners or the consumers.

There seems to be a general lack of coordination or system in all the panaceas suggested for the amelioration of the condition in which we now find ourselves. Capital wants high protection to help it meet the inroads made by the income and war taxes upon its dividends. Labor wants increase of wages to help it meet the high cost of living. But it is neither by protective tariffs nor other artificial devices that you can make industries thrive and prosper; nor is it by a temporary sop to labor in the way of wages that you can make the life of the wage earner more endurable. We have been going along on that road—the road of the charlatan—long enough. The thing to do now is to make a declaration in this Congress that quack doctoring is at an end.

Let us announce to the world that prices are at their highest peak and that henceforth nothing shall be entertained—no proposal considered—which directly or indirectly will tend to enhance the cost of anything.

So long as we listen to the plaints of the manufacturers that they must have higher tariff barriers to protect them, so long will we be obliged to entertain the plaints for higher wages. Both are interdependent and inseparable. To increase tariffs will only enhance the cost of living, and it is the experience of mankind that a material increase of wages is soon absorbed in the general rise in prices which inevitably follows. The increase in wages is like chicken feed thrown to the little chicks in the barnyard, to be instantly gobbled up by the big roosters.

Every increase in either protective tariffs or wages is invariably used as a pretext for further profiteering. Prices of all commodities react immediately, and the cost of living receives another boost; the tariff raise and the wage raise are soon more than neutralized. Then your pet industries will be back here asking for further help to defy the pauper labor of Europe and Asia, protect American labor, and incidentally put a few more dollars in their pockets. Each step in this endless struggle to obtain equilibrium will find the wage earner the sufferer, because each advance is inexorably and inevitably absorbed by the general rise in prices, which is invariably out of all proportion to the advance in tariff or in wages.

Another objection, and a most serious one, is that after the process of raising prices has gone on for some time we begin to deal with larger and still larger units; which makes the business of profiteering easier, simpler, and more profitable. Thus where the market would justify only a raise, say, of 10 per cent, the profiteer adds 15 per cent to his price; the next in the chain of distribution adds 20 per cent, and, finally, when it gets to the wage earner he will be mulcted by an increase of 25 per cent upon the original cost. We come, then, to deal with the dollar as we formerly dealt with the half dollar or the quarter. Our currency is depreciated; our dollar has only half or one-quarter of its former purchasing value. The mechanic who earns $40 a week now is in a poorer state financially than he was a few years ago when he earned $25 a week. This is the difficulty of our present situation, which contains so much of peril and makes it so hard to unravel. Despite all our attempts to mitigate conditions, the ultimate consumer finds himself helplessly enmeshed in the struggle for existence. You are not helping him by piling up tariffs. You are only building new obstacles in the pathway to plague the Nation in the ultimate adjustment.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman from North Carolina use all of his time? We have only one more speech on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has 55 minutes remaining.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the policies of the two parties represented on the committee are very widely apart with respect to the pending bill and other tariff bills reported out by the committee. We Democrats recognize that in the chemical and dyestuff industries there should be some kind of protection or encouragement for their establishment and maintenance in the United States, because they relate directly to war preparation, and so many other and larger industries are dependent upon them. The Democrats recognized this in 1916, and for the first time in the history of this Government they provided a tariff sufficient under conditions then—under normal conditions—to establish and maintain the dye and chemical industries in this country. The Republicans having been in power for almost a half century, though claiming to the people that they were for the establishment and maintenance by a protective tariff of American industries, refused during all those years absolutely to attempt to build up or encourage in the least the small industries whose products were used by the big industries, such as dyestuffs. The textile manufacturers and paint manufacturers and other manufacturers, whose capital and output amounted to millions and hundreds of millions of dollars, had so much influence with the Republicans in Congress for the last 50 years that the little fellows who made or who wished to produce dyestuffs that went into the products of these big manufacturers could not have a peep in. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the war came, although the Republican Party had been in power almost 50 years, we found that it had not encouraged the establishment of the chemical and dyestuff industries, the chemical-glass industry, the magnesite industry, the tungsten industry, the optical glass and instrument industry, or any other industries for which they are now asking a monopolistic tariff and many of which are essential in the manufacture of munitions of war.

The Republican eyes were on the big fellows and not on the little ones, and when the little fellows came to Washington and asked some little protection to start or maintain their little industries they were kicked out of the Capitol and told to go home and let them alone. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They were looking after the interests of the textile, the iron and steel, and many other big industries, who used these smaller products in the manufacture of their larger products.

They, by their system of protection to the big interests, relieved them of the payment of any tariff on many of their intermediate products that went into the manufacture of their finished products. Many were put on the free list, a low tariff was put on the others, in both cases to enable the large beneficiaries of their system to purchase in the markets of the world as cheaply as possible the materials necessary in the manufacture of their products. These beneficiaries were given protection in the purchase of their materials, to the detriment of the American producers of such materials, and protection in the sale of their finished product, to the injury of the American consumer.

The Democrats also recognize that there were a few industries established during and by the necessities of the war producing materials that are essential in the manufacture of direct munitions that should be encouraged and maintained in time of peace.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to yield to all later on, if my time will permit, but let me make my statement first. The Democrats of the Ways and Means Committee contend that this is no time to fool with the tariff and fix rates on any of these propositions. I believe that every intelligent man, be he a Republican or a Democrat, who has not some special interest in his district or State to serve will agree with us.

The Republican theory of protection—and you Republicans listen; I might get it wrong; correct me if I do—is that in levying a protective tariff you should put the rates only high enough to equalize the difference in the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home, especially the difference in the labor cost. Mr. Taft during his administration added "and the American standard of profit." This theory has been written into every Republican platform since the Civil War. It is the theory proclaimed in every Republican protective-tariff speech made in this House or in the Senate or on the stump since the Civil War.

They know, and you know, and every intelligent man in this country knows, that there is no possible way in these abnormal times to find out in any respect the cost of production abroad of any of the articles embraced in the pending bill or other articles. The Tariff Commission is unable at this time to find such cost. The commission has made reports on chemical glass, optical glass and instruments, magnesite, tungsten ore, and many other products embraced in this and other bills reported out by the Ways and Means Committee, and in none of these reports do they or have they undertaken to tell us the cost of their production abroad. It knew and knows that in these times, when cost of production and price are abnormal the world over, it would have been a useless task to have undertaken to ascertain the cost abroad. It has been unable to find out the cost of production here. Every man who testified before the Ways and Means Committee admitted that he did not know and could not find out the cost of production abroad of the articles enumerated in this bill on account of present conditions throughout the world. Every Republican on the committee will admit that there is no way now in these abnormal times to ascertain the cost of production abroad and that there was no proof before the committee of the cost of production abroad of the articles upon which Congress is asked to impose a high and exorbitant tariff. We could not get, nor could the Tariff Commission get, nor did the manufacturers who testified before us get, the evidence of the cost of production of the articles contained in this bill or know what it was. Is not that so, gentlemen of the committee? Did any man testify as to the cost of production of chemical glassware, of optical glassware, of surgical and dental instruments, or of any other article embraced in this bill? Not one.

Mr. BACHARACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BACHARACH. I had an exhibit here yesterday of beakers, in which it was shown that the Japanese could land them in this country for $1.01, equivalent to 45 per cent ad valorem, and the American goods cost about that to make without the overhead expenses, and they would sell for $1.27½.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; one gentleman testified that he bought 13 little glass beakers and a few other little glass articles for such and such a price that were imported from Japan. But he did not say what was the cost of production there or that he knew. He did testify that the American-made beakers were superior to those of the Japanese, which could account for the difference in price. There are hundreds of different kinds of chemical-glass articles. He only testified to the price of two or three, which he said were imported from Japan. What is the price or cost of production of the others?

Mr. BACHARACH. The gentleman will recall the testimony of Mr. O'Brien, who was a worker. He testified in reference to the cost.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; he is the gentleman sent down by the manufacturers to ask for them a 60 per cent duty.

Now, there is absolutely no evidence, and every Member knows it, of the cost of production abroad. Every witness that came before us said it, the Tariff Commission knows it. If we should find out such cost to-day, on account of the extraordinary and changing conditions throughout the world to-morrow or next week or month it might be radically different.

How can the Republicans of the committee or House write a tariff rate at this time and carry out the theory of equalizing the cost abroad and the cost at home if they do not know the cost abroad and have no way of finding out in these abnormal times what it is? It is most difficult to ascertain the cost here, much less abroad. The Tariff Commission has had much difficulty in ascertaining costs here, and in many cases could not do so.

There is no way in this world for any Republican or any protective-tariff man here or elsewhere at this time to get information enough to write a Republican protective tariff according to the professed theory and principles of the Republican Party. But the Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee and in this House do have all the information they want to write a protective-tariff bill according to the actual practice of the Republicans in writing tariff bills heretofore. Their theory has been, their profession has been, that the Republican principle is to have the rate so adjusted as to equalize the difference between the cost abroad and at home, and yet in the McKinley Act, the Dingley Act, and the Payne-Aldrich Act, of the dutiable articles at least 50 per cent had not only a tariff rate sufficient to equalize the difference in the cost of production abroad and at home but sufficient to cover the total labor cost of the articles made here.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Take cotton, for instance. They had a rate of an average of about 50 per cent. The labor cost in the cotton industry is less than 28 per cent. They had a tariff twice as high as the total amount of the labor expended in the production of the articles. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman was speaking, I believe, about the theory under which this 50 per cent tariff was imposed in this bill. Will the gentleman state upon what theory the 45 per cent tariff in the present law, the so-called Underwood bill, was fixed? Upon what theory was the 45 per cent tariff in the present law agreed on as the proper duty on this glass?

Mr. KITCHIN. It was agreed on because we had sufficient evidence on which to fix a Democratic rate. We agreed on 45 per cent because we believed it to be the best revenue-producing rate without being too heavy a burden on the users of such articles. We agreed on it not in order to protect the monopolists that would grow up here but to protect the Treasury and the users of this glassware. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand the gentleman to state that his committee had evidence as to the foreign cost and the domestic cost which enabled them to arrive at a duty of 45 per cent?

Mr. KITCHIN. We had evidence enough to enable us to write a tariff act according to Democratic theory—first looking to the interest of the Government, and second, looking to the interest of the consumer, with the manufacturer having the protection incident to such a tariff. But as to the 45 per cent on chemical glassware there was no protection in it to such an American industry, because, though Republicans had control of the Government from 1860 to 1913, excepting eight years, there was no American chemical-glass industry when we took control in 1913 and framed the Underwood Act. In asking his question the gentleman left out something. The Democrats in the Underwood bill saw, and I am going to show the gentleman the difference between that and this bill, that 50 per cent of all of the chemical glassware used in this country was used by students in colleges and universities, the students taking chemical and scientific courses. We kept that on the free list for those students. This bill, as I shall show the House, taxes the struggling students of the colleges and universities $13.33 each annually. They pay it out of their pockets; not into the Treasury of the Government, but into the treasury of a few manufacturers. In this bill you tax the students of the colleges and universities taking a scientific course $900,000 annually in order to help foster a monopoly of a half dozen chemical-glass producers in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is opposed to that feature of the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. What?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The elimination of the free list.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and I am going to show——

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is a new theory on the gentleman's part, is it not?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not understand him ever to oppose it the other day.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes; the gentleman must have understood me to oppose it. He could not have understood or thought that I would ever consent to make these struggling students pay tribute of $900,000 annually to a monopoly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood differently from the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am trying to show the gentleman that he ought to oppose it, and that in his heart he will oppose it—I do not care how the machine makes him vote. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman says that his party put the chemical glassware on the free list for use in the universities.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the scientific institutions for the benefit of the students; yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. In doing that, did you not absolutely destroy that industry in this country?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; because though the Republicans had had control of the Government and had been framing protective-tariff acts for nearly 50 years there was no such industry here to destroy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There was not produced $10,000 worth of chemical glass in this country.

I think I have shown you that upon the Republican theory of a protective tariff you have no data at all upon which to fix a rate, but upon the practice, as I said, of Republicans in putting their real tariff principles into the statutes they have acted by this bill according to the rule by which every Republican Congress in the last 50 years in dealing with the tariff has acted. Their theory is one way, their profession is one way, but their practice is another. This is written in exact accordance with the principle of every protective-tariff bill that has been written by the Republican Party since the Civil War, of the McKinley bill, of the Dingley bill, and of the Payne-Aldrich bill, and what is that principle? To give the beneficiaries, the manufacturers, the rate that they want, that they ask for, based on no fact except their avarice and passion for profits. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Who said 60 per cent was the proper rate or tax for chemical glassware that the students of our educational institutions must pay, which on them alone will amount to $900,000 a year? Why, the manufacturers of this chemical glass. Did the Tariff Commission say 60 per cent? Oh, no. Did any one of these members of the committee say 60 per cent? Oh, no. Did anybody on earth say 60 per cent was the right and just rate except the manufacturers, the beneficiaries of that exorbitant duty? They asked it, it went in the bill, and that is the way all these high rates got in all the other bills the committee has reported out.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Is that the Vineland matter that the gentleman is going to refer to?

Mr. BACHARACH. I have it right here, but there is another matter. The gentleman stated that only the manufacturers asked for the 60 per cent rate. As a matter of fact, Mr. Clark, president of the Flint Glassworkers' Union, asked for 60 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. The manufacturers——

Mr. BACHARACH. But he is a workingman, and Mr. O'Brien——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Clark is the president of the Glassworkers' Union, and Mr. O'Brien is connected with the glass-manufacturing business.

Mr. BACHARACH. And Mr. Parsons.

Mr. KITCHIN. The manufacturers told them to come down here to Washington and ask the Republican committee to put on a 60 per cent rate; that it would help the glassworker. They came and asked; and so it is still the manufacturers who, through Mr. Clark and Mr. O'Brien, as well as themselves directly, are telling you what rate they want and what rate you should put in. Is not that so? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BACHARACH. Does the gentleman recall what Dr. Herty said in reference to this 60 per cent rate?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I know what he said. He said the manufacturers said they wanted 60 per cent. He said that he was not an expert on the tariff; that he did not know what the rate should be; but they said they ought to have it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And he was for it. Of course I know what Dr. Herty said. You see I remember these little things. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACHARACH. Does the gentleman recall what Mr. Parsons, secretary of the American Chemical Society, stated?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir; I recall very well what he said. He stated positively that he knew nothing about what the rate should be—that he had never studied the question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The American Chemical Society, through Dr. Parsons, let it be known that they did not object to 60 per cent; that they knew nothing about tariff rates; but that was what the manufacturers wanted, and they were willing to stand by what the manufacturers wanted in order to build up the industry. [Applause on the Democratic side.] How did these chemists know anything about the cost of production here or the cost of production abroad? They wanted the industry here. They did not manufacture. They did not care what the rates were, how high they were made. The only fellows who were interested in the rates were the manufacturers who are going to make money out of this exorbitant 60 per cent. And neither this chemical society nor the members of it are going to have to pay a cent of this tariff tax. The big corporations, in whose employ they are, like the Steel Corporation, the sugar and oil refineries, and so forth, that use much chemical glass in their testing laboratories, and the educational institutions, of whose faculty they may be members, and the students of such institutions, will have to bear the burden of the tax.

I trust I have given some reasons why the committee and the House can not at this time fix the rates in this bill or any other bill that will carry out the Republican professed theory of a protective tariff, because they are absolutely ignorant of all the necessary and essential data and facts. They have done, as I have said, in this bill, if it becomes law, what they have done in all bills—given the tariff favorites an opportunity to exact the amount of money they want from the pockets of the people in order to put it into their own pockets. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe Republican members of the committee will admit that at this time no one on or off the committee knows the cost of production abroad of the articles embraced in this bill, and it is most difficult to find out the cost of production here. They have had no evidence——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Why does the gentleman say that when we will not admit it at all?

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no evidence of it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The record is full of evidence, which the gentleman will not read or quote.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no such evidence. There was evidence of what some gentleman said he paid for a few dollars' worth of a few little glassware articles which he said were imported from Japan. But this bill covers hundreds of different kinds of articles other than chemical glass. But I will test the gentleman. Here is a table containing several dozens of other articles in the bill, put on exhibition here to aid the passage of this bill. Now, I ask the gentleman what did this instrument I hold in my hand cost to produce in Germany or Japan?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It cost less than it was sold for. The gentleman has no argument——

Mr. KITCHIN. What did this one cost to produce and what did this one cost to produce in Japan or Germany? Where is the evidence and where is any testimony? You have the copy of the testimony; point me to the page. Well, what did this instrument cost in Germany or Japan? Why, I will vote for your bill if you can tell me that, or if you will cite a scintilla of testimony as to the production cost in Germany or Japan or the United States or elsewhere in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. Knowing, as the gentleman does, that the wages in Japan range from 15 to 50 cents per day and $6 in this country, which one do you think cost the more, the Japanese or the American? [Applause.] The gentleman has that evidence. He knows that is the difference between the wages in this country and Japan and——

Mr. KITCHIN. I know no such thing; neither does the gentleman. Is Japan shipping this chemical glass and optical glass here? Is she shipping surgical and dental instruments here?

Mr. FORDNEY. We have the Japanese goods there, and we have the prices there of what it cost to make in this country.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is correct as to the difference in labor cost, how absurd and ridiculous is his and his committee's claim that 60 per cent is sufficient tariff to protect these manufacturers against Japanese competition. It was claimed in the hearings that the labor is about 70 or 75 per cent of the cost of all the articles here—they said labor was 90 per cent on these things—but for the argument let us admit that labor is 70 or 75 per cent of the cost. The gentleman from Michigan tells you that the labor here is $6 a day for the same labor in Japan that receives from 15 to 50 cents. That is, the producer here pays at least twelve times—from twelve to forty times—as much as is paid for the same work in Japan. Now, in order to protect the manufacturers here, according to the gentleman's figures and theory, the tariff will have to be from 800 to over 2,000 per cent. Why did you give the pitiful 60 per cent when you would need from 800 to over 2,000 per cent in order to protect our manufacturers against Japan? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell you why and let you know why. You know that no rate of duty can be put upon these goods that will equal the difference in the cost between this country and Europe and——

Mr. KITCHIN. We are talking about Japan now.

Mr. FORDNEY. You know that we can not make a law that will protect us against Japan.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then why bring in this tariff bill as a protection against Japan? Of course their statement of the difference in wages and costs shows that they are using Japan as a ghost with which to scare Republicans, especially Progressive Republicans, and some weak-kneed Democrats who want protection on some industry in their districts into voting for this exorbitant, monopoly-making tariff bill. If Japan is making these articles, and if 90 per cent or 70 per cent of the cost is labor—they testified that Japan was just flooding the country with this kind of wares—and Japan pays from 15 to 50 cents per day to the fellow who works and we pay here $6 per day, why the manufacturer would have to have over 1,000 per cent tariff in order to protect him, and it is an insult to him for Republicans to tell him that they are going to protect him with a little 60 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If this were true, there is not a manufacturer in the United States who would remain in business 24 hours. If this were true, with a 60 per cent rate provided in this bill, Japan would sell every single one of these articles, and there would not be, there could not be, sold here an American-made article. Japan would wipe out every American manufacturer within 30 days unless the American workman was from twelve to forty times more efficient than the Japanese workman and turned out for his employer from twelve to forty times as much product. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has let somebody impose on him. You see, these Republicans over here are so afraid of the real truth and right and justice of Democratic contention in these matters that they will not let me state it. They continue to interrupt me. Do not look so mad at me. [Laughter.] I am the most harmless Democrat you ever saw in your life. [Laughter.] I like a Republican just as much as I do a Democrat. You Republicans are just bad politically; that is all; and you are not enlightened on the tariff. [Laughter.]

Let us see if our position at this time is not a reasonable position, taking it from a patriotic standpoint. Nobody knows at this time how to write intelligently or scientifically a tariff bill on the Republican theory or on the Democratic theory, because we have got to know, in considering and writing a tariff according to the Republican theory, what the difference is between the cost of production abroad and here, and in considering a tariff according to the Democratic theory we ought to have a reasonable knowledge as to the difference in the cost. It is admitted by everybody that this is not known at this time, and can not be known what it will be a week or a month or a year

hence, because of the rapidly varying conditions. Here is the Democratic position: We realize the wisdom and necessity of maintaining the chemical and dyestuff industries and a few other industries essential in the production of materials for direct munitions of war, which industries were established here during and by the necessities of the war, but which are valuable in the production of necessary articles of everyday use. In the present and ever-changing conditions, having no data or facts upon which to intelligently base a tariff rate, the Democrats propose for a period of two years—a reasonable transition period from abnormal to normal conditions—a license system for importation of chemicals and dyestuffs and the few war essential materials referred to by me a moment ago; that the Tariff Board shall constitute the license board; that no license to import such articles shall be granted within the two years—the transition period from abnormal to normal—unless it be shown that they can not be obtained in the United States at a reasonable price; if such be shown, license to import shall be granted. This will with certainty protect these newly established war essential industries and at the same time prevent the manufacturers here from demanding exorbitant prices. By the expiration of the two years we can hope that conditions of production and values here and elsewhere throughout the world will become normal. By then the Tariff Commission and others can give Congress proper data as to the cost of production at home and abroad. We can then, if it ever could be done, ascertain the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. Both the Republicans and Democrats will then be in an intelligent position to write a tariff and fix rates according to their respective theories. Why is not this the intelligent, reasonable, and patriotic position for all of us to take? We know and you know that any rate we can fix under existing conditions is a pure guess, unless we do as the Republicans propose to do by this and other bills, and that is give the rate the manufacturers desire and demand. As a permanent proposition we do not favor the import-license system. We propose it as a temporary measure to bridge over the extraordinarily abnormal conditions throughout the world. We would propose this as an amendment to this and other similar bills or in a motion to recommit, but unfortunately, according to the rules of the House, such an amendment or motion to recommit is subject to a point of order.

The Republicans on the committee are now solidly against our proposition. The beneficiaries of this bill are against it. Let me say to the House that the very first bill that I saw before our committee this session was a bill introduced by the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], leaving out all tariff and putting in it only the license system. This was the potash bill. We propose now, as to this and the other bills reported out, this principle. He ought to indorse our proposition, because we adopted his principle of the temporary license system.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman know that he is in error when he makes that statement? If you will look at the bill you will see whether there is any tariff in it or not.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no Republican tariff in it. I believe it did include a provision that after five years there should be a duty of $10 a ton on this product, but no tariff at all until after five years. But the policy that the Democrats are contending for now was incorporated in that bill, because it did not permit a tariff to be put upon it until five years, and the license board should have five years in which to license, long after the period from the abnormal to the normal had transpired. Our proposition is a license system for two years and then Congress can write a tariff in an intelligent way. But the gentleman and his party are now repudiating their own policy in their first bill in rejecting our proposition.

Now, gentlemen, let me get down to this specific bill. I will tell you why a good Democrat and a patriotic Republican can not vote for this bill. Are there any Progressive Republicans here? I guess they are all reactionaries, and I am sorry for it. [Laughter.] I believe they have got Brother LONGWORTH in the reactionary camp now. [Laughter and applause.]

I saw a great deal in the press before Congress met that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] was talking about "the old machine and the steering committee," and how "it had put the Republican organization of the House back into the hands of the old reactionaries." He got on the Ways and Means Committee, and I find that the reactionaries have now got Mr. LONGWORTH. [Laughter and applause.]

This bill levies a duty of 60 per cent on chemical glassware and 45 per cent on optical instruments. It removes the exemptions from duty to scientific and educational institutions. I want you Republicans to listen to this: Every tariff act from 1790 to the present—every Republican act, the McKinley Act, the Dingley Act, the Payne-Aldrich Act—has had in it this free, or exemption, clause, as to scientific and educational institutions, except the acts of 1846, 1857, 1864, and 1870. It was kept in by the Underwood Act. But these glass manufacturers came down here and told the Republicans of the Ways and Means Committee that they are tired of that clause in tariff acts and it must go out, and out it goes if this bill becomes law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It will not take half a second.

Mr. KITCHIN. Give me 20 minutes additional time and I will yield to all the gentlemen on that side. We have plenty of time. We limited general debate to two hours yesterday because we thought we were going to adjourn to-day for a five weeks' recess, but we can not go home now, and we have plenty of time to discuss matters in this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 20 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. In addition to the time I already have.

Mr. FORDNEY. I object.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Michigan, I know, does not want to know the truth about the tariff. [Laughter.] All he wants to know is what does the beneficiary want, what is the rate the manufacturer demands, and into the bill it goes. [Laughter.]

This bill, according to the evidence and figures in the Tariff Commission report, and every man on the committee who has investigated it knows it, as to chemical glass alone puts upon each student, each poor, struggling student in the chemical departments of our colleges or universities, a tax annually of $13.33, and it will mean, according to the estimated production and use now, a tax of $900,000 annually that the Republicans by this bill are going to take out of the pockets of the struggling students and transfer to the pockets of the glass manufacturers in the district of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] and in one or two other districts. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not a Republican can deny that.

Gentlemen, if there is a man that is a friend of these institutions and a friend of the poor, hard-working students in this country, how can he vote to strike out the exemption clause which has been in every tariff act, except the four I have mentioned, for the last 130 years—in the McKinley Act, the Dingley Act, the Payne-Aldrich Act, and now in the Underwood Act. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is what this is going to do.

In its investigation of the chemical-glass industry the Tariff Commission examined the chemical-glass manufacturers. Attention now: The Tariff Commission in its report of June 3, 1919, declares that the manufacturers of the chemical glass only asked for the elimination of the free-list clause and the 45 per cent rate that is now in the Underwood bill. But in this bill the Republicans not only remove the free-list clause, but increase the rate to 60 per cent. We have 45 per cent in the Underwood Act, but exempting the scientific and educational institutions and their students from the payment of duty, just as the Payne-Aldrich Act, the Dingley Act, and the McKinley Act did.

Let me read from the Tariff Commission report of June 3, 1919:

> The manufacturers that have established this new industry—
>
> Of chemical glass—
> in the United States since 1914 are satisfied with the existing rate of 45 per cent, but urge that the provision in paragraph 573—
> Which is the exemption to scientific and educational institutions—
> be eliminated.

The report further states that they said if this were done they could successfully compete with foreign products. But the manufacturers knowing the servility of the Republicans to the special interests came down here before the committee and said they took back their wants before the Tariff Commission and they now wanted a 60 per cent rate, and 60 per cent went into this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] said in his speech yesterday that Japan right now was flooding this country with importation of these articles. I have obtained from the Department of Commerce the statistics of all the glassware of every description that Japan has shipped into this country since the 1st of January of this year. From the 1st of January until the 31st of May of this year all the importations of glass and glassware of every description from Japan amounted to only $124,000! We are producing in this country yearly over $150,000,000 worth of glassware of all kinds. In other words, Japan's importation of glassware for a year amounts to only one-sixth of 1 per cent of the total annual glassware produced in this country. Of every $100 worth made and sold in this country and imported from Japan, Americans manufactured and sold $99.82 worth and Japan sold 18 cents worth. Flooding us, of course! If I had a business in which I could sell $99.82 worth and my competitor could only sell 18 cents worth I would be the biggest fool in the world to stand before an intelligent audience, much less Congress, and say, "If you do not give me some protection that little Japanese is going to run me out of business." [Laughter.]

In the McKinley Act, in the Dingley Act, in the Payne Act, and in the Underwood Act educational and scientific institutions were exempted from the payment on optical instruments. This bill eliminates this exemption and increases the duty from 25 per cent to 45 per cent upon the importations of all optical glass and instruments. This imposes upon the educational and scientific institutions a tax additional to the chemical-glass tax of at least $250,000, according to present production and use. The larger part of optical instruments used in normal times in this country is used by such institutions. The two or three optical instrument manufacturers that produce practically all such instruments in this country demand that this exemption be eliminated, and that this tax of $250,000 be taken out of the treasury of these institutions and put into their treasury. The Republicans in this bill straightway did as they were bidden. On "philosophical, scientific, and laboratory apparatus, utensils, instruments, and appliances" the tariff by this bill is increased over 50 per cent. On surgical and dental instruments the tariff by this bill is increased from 20 per cent to 60 per cent—an increase of 300 per cent—at the demand and for the benefit of less than half a dozen manufacturers who produced 80 per cent or more of such instruments in this country. According to the figures of the manufacturers themselves who appeared before the committee as to the amount now being used in civil life in this country this increase of the tariff imposes a tax of at least $5,000,000 upon the doctors, surgeons, and dentists, including charitable hospitals, in this country. The Republicans by this bill, should it become a law, deliberately take out of the pockets of the doctors, surgeons, and dentists of the United States at least $5,000,000 and put it into the pockets of a half dozen manufacturers, to enable them to make as much profit as they want.

Have the doctors and dentists, have the hospitals, private and charitable, of this country signified in any way to the Republicans of the committee or of the House their willingness to bear this tremendous sacrifice to satify the passion for profits of a few favored manufacturers? Has the Ways and Means Committee had before it a single doctor or surgeon or dentist or a single representative of a hospital or a representative of any medical, surgical, or dental association? Not one. They have not been heard. Neither has any college nor university nor student, nor representative of them, who will bear the burden of over a million dollars a year put upon them by this bill for the benefit of a special few manufacturers, been heard. No one has represented before our committee the doctors and surgeons and dentists and hospitals and the educational institutions and the students of this country except the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, and no one is representing them on this floor except the Democratic Members of this House, who are now protesting and fighting this iniquitous bill, with its high and monopolistic tariff.

Now, another principle in this bill is an old-time principle, not professed, however, but always practiced, though, by Republicans, and that is favoritism to the special few. There never was a tariff bill written by a Republican Congress that was not brimfull of favoritism. You Republicans, listen to me now, if you please; I am going to tell you something of which you have not thought and which may interest you. The Republicans got so in the habit, in the last 50 years, of crowding tariff bills with special favoritism to the big interests at the expense of all the people that they have now, in consideration of tariff bills, invoked and made that policy operate among Republican Members of the House—bestowed favors upon a special few at the expense of the many Republicans of the House. This House is going to be surprised at this: Almost every Republican in the House has little industries here and there in his district, among many others, such as magnesite and pyrites and graphite and manganese, the latter more essential in war and in peace than any one of the materials which the bills reported out propose to protect. But we have not seen any bill reported out protecting these or any other industry in your district, have we? But what kind of bills have been reported out to protect the little industry in the district of the layman Republican Member? Where is it? There were hearings on manganese and graphite and pyrites, and so forth, but there is no bill reported out for them. There has been no consideration of them by the committee. The bills that are reported to-day happen to be bills introduced by Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee who have a little special industry in their districts to protect. [Laughter.] You even legislate for the few as against the many of your own members, gentlemen. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us see. The bill that we have now under consideration protects chemical glass, surgical and dental instruments, optical glass and instruments, and so forth. Where are the producers of these located? In the State of New Jersey. In whose district? In the district of my good, genial, likable, amiable friend, Mr. BACHARACH. [Laughter.] Who introduced this bill to let these New Jersey manufacturers mulct the people of millions in order to put it in their pockets? Mr. BACHARACH, of New Jersey, of course. [Laughter.] Whose bill was reported out? Mr. BACHARACH'S bill. What committee is Mr. BACHARACH on? The Ways and Means Committee, of course. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Well, all of this glass and glassware in Mr. BACHARACH'S district and in one or two other districts which is protected in this bill will not amount to more than $4,000,000, and yet the output of the glass industry in this country producing other kinds of glassware will amount to $150,000,000 a year. No bill reported out to protect any other kind of glass industry. Why? But they are in the districts of Republican Members not on the Ways and Means Committee. Why do not some of the 235 Republicans not on the committee get some consideration? Favoritism! I do not blame the Republicans. It is a natural thing for them. They have acquired the favoritism—the special-few—habit.

Here is another bill for the protection of magnesite, not manganese.

Well, where is the magnesite industry located? Why, up in the State of Washington, way out yonder in Washington, the district of my good friend, Mr. HADLEY, of Washington.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, do not take my time.

Mr. HADLEY. I do not want to take the gentleman's time. I will get the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to give the gentleman five minutes more time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is not the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The evidence was that the biggest company in the United States producing magnesite was in Washington. Is not that so?

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Is not that so?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just for a question; but let the gentleman be quick.

Mr. HADLEY. Does not the gentleman know that the hearings show that there is none of this magnesite that the gentleman refers to in my district?

Mr. KITCHIN. You are from the State of Washington, are you not?

Mr. HADLEY. I said "in my district."

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, all right. The gentleman is big enough to represent the whole State. [Laughter.] The largest company producing magnesite in the whole country is in the State of Washington. Is not that true? Magnesite is a Washington industry. The bill is introduced by Mr. HADLEY, from the State of Washington, not by the other gentlemen from the State of Washington in whose districts the industry is located. Why——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest——

Mr. KITCHIN. Please do not interrupt me just now.

Mr. BLANTON. I want a lot of other Members to be here to hear this good speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. HADLEY introduced this bill, which I hold in my hand, to protect a little industry in his State. Mr. HADLEY'S bill is reported out. We are going to consider it after we finish this bill. On what committee is Mr. HADLEY? On the Ways and Means Committee, of course. [Laughter.] Other Republicans have industries in their districts, but no bill is reported out to protect them. Why? Republican favoritism. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The few against the many.

There is tungsten ore, gentlemen, not nearly as important as a war material as half a dozen others that I might mention, and yet there is no bill for those others here, but there is one here to protect tungsten ore. Tungsten ore is produced in Colorado, and the gentleman who introduced the bill to protect that industry in Colorado is my good friend—as fine a gentleman as ever I met, and as diligent a Member as there is here—Mr. TIM-

BERLAKE, of Colorado. His bill is reported out by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee. The House will soon consider it. What committee is my friend Mr. TIMBERLAKE on? On the Committee on Ways and Means, of course. [Laughter.] That bill has been introduced, favorably acted upon, and reported out, and will soon pass a Republican House; but the other bills that Republicans not on the committee introduced to protect the industries in their districts are not yet reported out, and the Lord only knows when. [Laughter.]

We passed a bill here the other day over my protest to protect something that ninety-nine one-hundredths of you never heard of before in your lives—loganberry juice. Made where? Not in North Carolina, not in Pennsylvania, not in Michigan, not in Colorado, but made in the State of Oregon, practically all of it in the State of Oregon. The bill was introduced by Mr. HAWLEY, a Representative from the State of Oregon. That bill was promptly considered, that bill was promptly reported out, and that bill was promptly passed through the House, over my vote, however.

A MEMBER. What committee is Mr. HAWLEY on?

Mr. KITCHIN. What committee is Mr. HAWLEY on? Of course on the Ways and Means Committee. [Laughter.] His bill would not have been reported out by this Republican committee if he had not been a member. Now, there is one gentleman on our committee who I thought could not be persuaded or tempted to harvest the fruits of this or any system of favoritism. I saw a certain bill that was reported out, and I said, "Here, no doubt, is an exception to the rule. This gentleman certainly has no such industry in his district or State which his bill proposes to protect." He is one of the older members of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I will say that he is one of the most diligent and valuable members of that committee and did a great service on that committee during the last four years. No man did greater service on that committee in helping to prepare the big war tax measure of the last Congress than this gentleman "That gentleman surely," said I, "has no spirit of favoritism about him; surely he is not going to help Republican members of the committee to monopolize all protection bills. Surely here is a Member who introduced a bill, on purely patriotic grounds, to protect a legitimate industry in some other State or district than his own." It is a bill to protect what? The pearl-button industry. And its author is my friend Judge GREEN of Iowa. [Laughter.] I said to the clerk, "Go and bring me the hearings," and I read them, and lo and behold, when I read the hearings I found that more than 50 per cent of all the pearl buttons manufactured in the United States were made in one little town in the State of Iowa named Muscatine, and that over 75 per cent of the pearl buttons made in the United States were made in the State of Iowa—the good old State of my good old friend, Judge GREEN, the author of the bill to protect pearl buttons. [Laughter.] Then I said, "Ah, the Republicans are true to their rule, true to their practiced policy of favoritism." [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. What committee is he on?

Mr. KITCHIN. What committee is he on? He is on the Committee on Ways and Means, of course. [Laughter.]

Does not it seem that, if not out of respect "for the opinions of mankind," out of decent regard and respect for the opinions of these 230 other Republicans not on the Ways and Means Committee who have industries in their districts the Republican Committee on Ways and Means would report out bills of Members not on the committee to protect some of the industries in their districts? [Laughter.] No. These Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means are a close corporation, and they propose to get all the benefits in reach, to the exclusion of others. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is natural All of these bills are to protect monopolies and to make monopolies, every one of them.

Of course another princple they carry out is to let the Republican membership of the Committee on Ways and Means monopolize all the bills that were reported out. [Laughter.]

As the Democratic national platform says, the Republican scheme of protection is a scheme that protects and enriches the few at the expense of the many. So you have just left out about 250 Members, or more, whatever the number is you have got. You other fellows have got to suffer. Under machine rule, orders have gone out from the steering committee and the committee of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to those who are standing out in the cold with no bills to protect the industries in their districts and States, "You come and swallow this bill down, whether your district is protected or not. You have got to do it. If you do not, we are going to have Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania get up on the floor of this House and denounce you as he did Mr. EMERSON the other day for his disobedience of orders." [Laughter and applause.]

You know, gentlemen, that there were some Republicans put on this committee as new members at the beginning of this Congress. I am going to give Republicans not on the committee a pointer now. One of the new members of the committee is the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY]. He has a bill reported out. Another new member is the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE], and he has a bill reported out. Another new member is the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH]. He has a bill reported out, the one we are now considering. You other Republican gentlemen who have industries in your districts to protect did not have sense enough to know what committee to get on. [Laughter.] When you who have little industries in your districts go home, and you are asked why you did not protect this and that industry, you have got to tell them that these other fellows were smart enough to know what committee to get on and you were not. But the next time of the making up of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee there is going to be a scramble before the committee on committees, for all the Republicans that have little industries in their districts to protect will be candidates for membership on the Ways and Means Committee, because they now know what it means. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized for 22 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not believe there is a man in this House who is better acquainted with our good friend [Mr. KITCHIN] than I am. When he makes a sacred agreement he is absolutely straight and dependable, but on his feet on this floor in a speech he is as slippery as a greased eel. [Laughter.] If the truth will not do, something else will be substituted therefor. [Laughter.] When the gentleman speaks of the difference between the cost of an article in this country and in a foreign country he knows that there on that table is an article of glassware which the undisputed evidence shows sold at wholesale in Yokohama only a few weeks ago for 59 cents, while the labor cost is $1.01 in the production of that article in this country. Yet he contends that we need no duty to offset the difference in the cost of production in this country and the cost of production abroad. How can intelligent men take such a position.

The President of the United States last night asked Congress to remain here and raise wages and at the same time lower the cost of living. A suggestion of that kind comes from a man who is not sincere.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] knows that there was evidence presented to the committee by a man representing practically all the colleges and chemical laboratories in this country, recommending a high import duty on this laboratory glassware and these surgical instruments, samples of which I have here, and he said the colleges and laboratories were almost unanimous in asking that a duty be put upon those articles that are now on the free list. The gentleman from North Carolina knows that. His memory is not so short.

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not catch what the gentleman said.

Mr. FORDNEY. A gentleman came before our committee who said he represented practically all the colleges in the United States and all the chemical laboratories, and that they had a meeting, and there were several hundred institutions represented, and they were almost a unit in asking for a duty on those articles, and he recommended a higher duty. If I have the time, I will read his remarks.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said a gentleman came before us and said the duty ought to be 60 per cent, but nobody came representing the students who have got to pay for these things.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; this very man represented the students, and I will put his remarks in the RECORD. He said that those articles when sold to the students by the institutions that imported them free they did not sell them to the students at the price at which they were purchased, but sold them to the students at double the price paid for them by those institutions.

Mr. KITCHIN. He said some small institutions did that, but he did not give the name of a single college that did it.

Mr. FORDNEY. He represented those colleges, and he made that statement, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. KITCHIN. What is his name?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have but 20 minutes, but I will put his statement in the RECORD,

On page 61 of the hearings here is what Mr. O'Brien said in answer to a question:

Mr. O'BRIEN. No, sir; I have just got the statement "Japanese goods sold in New York, duty and transportation charges paid, $1 each. American manufacturing cost without overhead expenses, $1.01 each; price f. o. b. Yokohama, 59 cents."

Mr. Warren S. Hood, representing the Vineland Scientific Glass Co., of Vineland, N. J., was asked by the chairman of the committee if the Government really encouraged the manufacturers to produce these articles during the war, and I quote from the hearing:

The CHAIRMAN. Would you say that the Government really encouraged the manufacturers to produce these articles during the war?

Mr. HOOD. Absolutely; yes, sir. They called us to Washington immediately after the declaration of war, and the manufacturers of apparatus were then formed into what was known as the apparatus section of the Council of National Defense. I was then secretary of that until I went into the Army. The first problem that we had to tackle was the biological containers for the Surgeon General's Department. Theretofore the Surgeon General had used the German product entirely, and they did not know where they were going to get the product, or who was to make it for them. That statement would be corroborated by the Surgeon General's office.

And now you would destroy that industry. Let me say to the gentlemen of the House that every time a tariff proposition is presented to the Democratic side of the House, they have a conniption fit, although for a hundred years they have written in their platform that they stand for a tariff for revenue only. The Democratic Party manages the affairs of this Government just now, and this Government never needed money as badly in its existence as it has since this war began, and now this year, in addition to $5,000,000,000 estimated to be collected from taxes, the administration is going to dispose of $2,000,000,000 of Government bonds with which to get money enough to run the expenses of the Government this fiscal year. Yet you would not vote to put one dollar of import duty on an article made in this country, while all the time shouting yourselves hoarse that you stand for a lower cost of living and higher wages for the laboring man. Any man who takes the position that by increasing wages he can lower the cost of living is either a fool or a demagogue or both. It is impossible to increase wages in the country and at the same time lower the cost of production, and you know it. You know that when your party came into power six years ago there was little complaint about the high cost of living in this country, and now the cost of living is sky high, and you are shouting yourselves hoarse at the Republicans to lower the cost of living. Oh, nonsense. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] speaks about me as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and says that I brought in a bill here to lower the tax upon loganberry juice made in Oregon. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that when he was the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means we passed a revenue bill, and Coca-Cola was untaxed. Coca-Cola is not made in Oregon or in Michigan; it is made in Georgia, down near the gentleman's home, where he lives in North Carolina. Put that in your pipe and smoke it. [Laughter.] Talk about favoritism! The gentleman has never known me to use partisanship or to be small enough to want a duty on an article in the district which I have the honor to represent or in the State of Michigan to the detriment of other parts of the country. I have stood for equal protection to all the industries in the States of the Union, and that is where I stand to-day. [Applause on Republican side.] I shall vote for protection to the industries in North Carolina the same as in Michigan or in Oregon. Will the gentleman from North Carolina do likewise? No. He will go crazy at the presentation of a tariff measure. But we are going to make you take it, great or small, whether you are willing or not.

I have here prices from the Japanese on a portion of these goods you see on this table. Some of these samples are Japanese and some of them are American. On the 14th of June this year they offered for sale, delivered in New York, some of these goods for 6.80 yen, and a yen is about half a dollar or a fraction less, which amounts to $3.30 our money, while at the same time it is shown that it does cost to produce that same article in this country $6. Yet these gentlemen think we need no protection. The gentleman from North Carolina argues here that we did not put the duty high enough to offset the difference between our cost and the Japanese cost. The most difficult problem in the framing of a tariff law is the fear of getting that duty so high that it protects our industries against Japan but makes it prohibitory as to those goods made in Europe. The European cost is greater than the oriental cost, and the gentleman knows it, and if we put on a tariff large enough to offset the difference in our cost and the cost of that article when made in Germany or anywhere in Europe, it is not sufficient to offset the difference in the cost between this country and the Orient. And if we do make the duty high enough to offset the difference between our cost and the cost in the Orient, then that duty is prohibitory as to Europe, and the European goods can not come at all. There must be a middle ground somewhere where we must give and take. The gentleman is well informed. He is a brilliant fellow, and there is no better fellow living, but you heard what I said about his speech on the floor of this House. Let him alone, for he will get the best of you, no matter what he has to resort to to do it. He is a buzz saw on his feet. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'Brien, president of a labor organization, and another gentleman from Pittsburgh came before our committee representing the glassworkers, 9,500 men, in the factories that he represented. He told us the great hardships of the men in hot weather in those factories, where they must work in a temperature of from 125° to 175°. In the wintertime it is more comfortable. He pointed out the wages that they were receiving, and he told us of the difference of the living conditions in this country and abroad. He said to the committee, "I want to go back to those 9,500 men and report to them whether or not you, the Congress of the United States, are going to legislate in the interest of the 9,500 glassworkers whom I represent, or will you legislate in the interest of the Japanese?" That is what he said. When you gentlemen get up here and get red in the face and shout at the top of your voices against a protective tariff in the interest of American labor, I want to know what you are going to say to those 9,500 men in those glass factories and millions of men in other American institutions. Charity begins at home. It is the duty of Members of Congress to legislate for the people who sent them here, not the people who shout to us from across the ocean through our Executive, through our President, while he was visiting in Europe. The President has recently issued an order, put into effect by the Railroad Administrator, reducing freight rates on oriental goods coming into this country entering Pacific coast ports. Reducing the freight rates from 20 to 90 per cent below the freight rates charged on domestic-made goods coming over the same route.

If he absorbed those sentiments while in Paris, I hope to goodness he never goes over again to represent the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. FORDNEY. Gentlemen, I ask you in all seriousness to support these bills. This bill is in the interest of American industry. American manufacturers do not give a penny's worth for a protective tariff, except to enable them to pay the American scale of wages when they are in competition with the same article made in a foreign country where the labor of the foreign country receives less pay than the American laboring man receives, because, my friends, the labor cost in the production of any article made in this country is the highest item of cost. In other words, let me say, there is nothing produced in any factory in this country where the labor cost is less than 90 per cent of the total cost of production.

Therefore I repeat that the American manufacturer wants protection only to enable him to pay the difference in the labor cost here and across the sea. My good friend from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], before the Ways and Means Committee, presented some statistics on labor in Switzerland and compared them with wages paid in this country. He was asked the question whether he was reading weekly wages or monthly wages, and he replied weekly wages. Twice he was asked that question. He showed that the wages in Switzerland were as high as $53 a week. If he had put his glasses on and examined the very Government document that he was reading he would have discovered that it was monthly and not weekly wages that he was giving. When the hearings went to the Printing Office the Printing Office corrected his statement, and wherever the figure "1" was noted there was a notation at the bottom of the Government article that Mr. RAINEY presented to the committee saying wherever the figure "1" appears it is monthly and not weekly wages. But the gentleman reiterated twice that he was giving weekly wages, and from $46 to $53 per week. The gentleman was mistaken, but on a tariff proposition that is as near as the gentleman from Illinois can come to correctness [applause on the Republican side], just about one-fourth of what is right.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. FORDNEY. Gentlemen, we have combined in this bill chemical glassware, optical glassware, and surgical instruments of all kinds. Before the war these articles were not made in this country. We could not compete with Germany. Germany used every unfair method to destroy industries of this kind the minute we started them in this country. No one has ever more clearly explained that than the Attorney General, Mr. Palmer, in his annual report as Alien Property Custodian, made last January, in which he goes on to show that there were five institutions in this country making chemicals. Three of those institutions were finally forced to go out of business for the reason the chemicals they were making, say oxalic acid, which was then selling for 6 cents, was reduced to 4.6, and finally to 2.2 a pound, and immediately upon closing their doors the Attorney General said the price went up to 7 cents, higher than ever before, and when the war broke out and we took part in that war we discovered that those two institutions that remained in business were German owned and he, as custodian of alien property, took them over.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. In just a minute. Let me conclude this. Therefore the two institutions that remained in business were German institutions, and the "yellow-dog" fund in Germany was used against our own industries to drive them out of business. The war has operated as the high protective wall. Our industries have sprung up in aid of the Government in its effort to defeat the enemy. Do we need now any greater lesson than the one we have just received? Do we want another war to drive it into our heads that it is necessary for the American Congress to protect American labor and American capital? I think not. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon articles named herein, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), the rates of duties herein prescribed, namely:

Glasswares and porcelain wares, laboratory apparatus, and other apparatus and appliances wholly or in part of glass or porcelain, for use in the sciences or in analyzing or testing or for use in education, 60 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, no one should take offense at anything the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] would say about Republicans or Republican doctrines, for we all know that he does not mean one-quarter of what he says and does not believe one-tenth of it. I have often spoken about the ability of the gentleman from North Carolina and his versatility. I have spoken of him so highly in that respect that I can scarcely add anything to it now but in one particular. In one respect the gentleman has shown that he is completely unsurpassed.

The gentlemen of this House have just listened to one of the greatest romances that was ever produced. I do not think it will be one of the "best sellers," but it is certainly unique in the respect I have mentioned. Throughout the speech of the gentleman, which was highly entertaining——

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the gentleman refer to the gentleman who has just finished?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do not interrupt me just at that point, if the gentleman will pardon me.

He drew almost entirely upon his imagination for his facts, and it did not disturb him in the least as to what they might be. He asserted boldly that we did not know anything about what the cost of these Japanese-made articles was, notwithstanding the fact that we had before the committee Japanese-made glassware with the cost of it sworn to. He asserted there was no testimony as to the wages of the Japanese, notwithstanding the hearings were full of it. He asserted that there were no bills reported by the Ways and Means Committee except those which had been introduced by the members of the committee. Why, let me tell the gentleman, for his information, that not only has the committee considered every bill that has been presented by the Republicans but we have even been so fair, in order to relieve the gentlemen upon that side from the unfortunate situation which they are in by reason of their past declarations, that I have introduced on the request of a Democrat a bill for an industry located in another State, in a district represented by a Democrat, who thought it was not best that he should introduce it himself or that he should ask the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to do so.

Mr. KITCHIN. May I ask just one question? With the exception of zinc, that is proposed now at the seventh hour, after we have resolved to report such bills out, name one that is reported by a member of the committee? Name one that was reported out, except the zinc proposition, that was not introduced by a member of the committee?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What of it?

Mr. KITCHIN. You said a while ago that it was a romance and was not true; that other bills had been reported out and introduced.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I said so, and I say so yet.

Mr. KITCHIN. Name one.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has just named one himself.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said with the exception of zinc——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is the potato flour bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Forced out by the personal influence of my friend over there.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have named them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, the gentleman is not going to disturb me by saying I have looked after the affairs of my own State. I will plead guilty to that indictment as often as he wants to make it, but I will deny on behalf of myself and the committee that there has been any inattention to any measure which was introduced either by a Republican or a Democrat, and I challenge the gentleman to name one that has not received full consideration from the committee. Now, let the gentleman name one, if he can.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have named them all that were before the committee that have not received consideration and been reported out.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There were no others, and all have been considered fully. He said there had been hearings on manganese and on pyrites. That is all the product of the gentleman's imagination, which is so fertile that it can blossom out into almost anything. There were no hearings, no requests from anybody that there should be a tariff change on those articles; not a hint of anything of the kind. But that did not prevent the gentleman from claiming the contrary, with all the force and vigor at his command, and it brought thunderous cheers on the Democratic side when he made those assertions that had not the slightest foundation in fact.

I looked for some argument upon the other side. Instead of getting it we have heard merely unfounded assertions, and the wider they were from the fact the more vociferously they were cheered. This bill may cost students who are taking a laboratory course in chemistry a few dollars more, but not what the gentleman claims. In fact, our factories are making an article so much superior that it may save them money in the long run. The cost is largely in the breakage, and the American ware is much more durable. At all events the bill will save a war industry from extinction by the underpaid labor of Japan.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I entirely agree with my colleague who has just addressed the committee as to the entertainment afforded by the speech of the distinguished gentleman of North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. It is possible the gentleman from Iowa and other gentlemen who have not been in the House quite so long as I have received a trifle more entertainment from it than I did, because during the sixteen-odd years that I have been in Congress I have heard that same speech—I can not say how many times. This, at least, I can say, however, that the gentleman never delivered it more attractively, eloquently, and more entertainingly than he did to-day.

As usual, exact accuracy in statement of fact was subordinated to rhetoric, and some of the gentleman's allegations deserve further elucidation. My friend starts out by saying that this is a bill to create a monopoly in the manufacture of chemical glassware. Let me call your attention to this fact, that the present duty, the duty provided by the party of which the gentleman is the most conspicuous authority in tariff matters, is to-day 45 per cent. Is the difference between 45 per cent and 60 per cent the difference between fair competition and monopoly? According to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], 15 per cent must constitute that difference.

In reply to a question that I asked him, the gentleman justified a duty of 45 per cent on these articles on the theory that it was the best possible revenue-producing duty. If that is the case and he is sincere in his further statement that these are articles which deserve protection, which deserve fostering, then on his own theory it is necessary to make the duty higher, because the highest revenue point is that at which the largest quantity of goods are imported, and hence a duty of 45 per cent would permit the absolute flooding of this market with the German and Japanese products.

The gentleman made a most earnest plea in behalf of the unfortunate student, who was to be taxed, I think he said, $13. How he got those figures I have not the remotest idea, but my friend from North Carolina says that he is to be taxed $13 in order to create this glass monopoly.

Now, what is the fact about all this question of the "poor student"? Why, gentlemen, it is simply this: For years a paragraph has been carried in all tariff laws enabling educational institutions to import these articles free of duty, and under that for many years more than half of all our importations of these various kinds of chemical apparatus have been coming into this country. The situation, however, has always been entirely different from what it is at present. In the old days and up to this very moment the educational institutions were asking that their apparatus be brought in free, because they did not believe that it could be made in America, and so we leaned upon Germany entirely for every single piece of apparatus that we have in our chemical laboratories. But to-day the situation is different. Shut off from Germany by the war, American citizens showed that they were capable of making just as good chemical apparatus as the Germans were capable of making, and now we do not want any more chemical apparatus made in Germany. And to-day these very educational institutions themselves, about whom the gentleman from North Carolina betrays such earnest solicitude, are asking that this free-trade paragraph be eliminated from this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If there is anything in the Democratic theory of free trade, or, if you please so to call it, a tariff for revenue, it is in the interest of the consumer. But when the consumer comes to you and tells you that he no longer wants free trade in these articles, if you regard only the interest of the consumer, is it not fair to take him at his word?

That is precisely the case here. Our educational institutions know now that Americans can make just as good chemical apparatus and surgical instruments as the Germans ever could, and they have learned the folly of relying upon any other nation for their supply of those articles which America herself can produce just as well. They learned a bitter lesson when this war came on, because they were for a time cut off entirely from the supply of those articles absolutely necessary to conduct the laboratory, educational, scientific, and industrial experiments and investigations in this country, and they now realize that the worst thing that could happen to the colleges and the educational institutions here would be again to be dependent upon the mercy of Germany for the supply of all these articles. Hence they are asking this House that this industry be made self-sustaining. So all the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina to the effect that we must look after the interests of the consumer and we must protect him against this great monopoly falls absolutely to the ground when the consumers themselves come and ask us to do just exactly what this bill does.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Has there been an objection from anybody to this bill—an objection of any kind or sort?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No. The first and only objection to this bill that I have heard comes from the gentleman from North Carolina. I have not heard in the committee any objection urged to it. I never knew before that the gentleman from North Carolina was opposed to the elimination of this free-trade provision until he took the floor to-day, nor did I ever hear that any other member of the committee was opposed to it.

Now, the situation is that the only difference between this bill and the present is a duty of 15 per cent, the difference between 45 per cent and 60 per cent. The gentleman from North Carolina justifies the duty of 45 per cent as having been made with full information by his own committee. He says that 45 per cent is the exact duty that ought to be imposed, because it will bring in the most revenue to the country. The only point at issue between us, then, is the increase from 45 per cent to 60 per cent.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman think that the increase of duty of 15 per cent would tend to reduce the high cost of living everywhere?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would it not be better, under the gentleman's theory, to put it on the free list? Would that reduce the high cost of living?

Mr. ASWELL. I think it might.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why, then, does not the gentleman offer that amendment? The gentleman has the opportunity now to offer the amendment to cut out 60 per cent and put these articles on the free list. If the gentleman is sincere in asking me that question and if he believes this has anything to do with the high cost of living, it is now open to him to offer such an amendment. I certainly would not vote for it, and the gentleman would not dare to offer such an amendment. I would challenge him to offer such an amendment here to-day, but I know that he would not, because he knows that it is pure bunk. [Applause on the Republican side.] His own leader here has absolutely justified this morning a duty of 45 per cent.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I will not yield further. Here, then, is the situation: So far as the rate of duty is concerned, the minority of the committee stands for 45 per cent, the majority for 60 per cent. The difference is too insignificant to quibble over. The elimination of the free-trade provision is demanded by the consumers themselves. Honestly, gentlemen, under such circumstances, what conceivable objection can be offered to this bill? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum. I think we ought to have a quorum here on this bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has come back. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). The Chair has ascertained that there are 101 Members present—a quorum.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the Chairman how many times did the Chair count the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]? He answered so many times that I do not know whether the Chairman counted him correctly or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. The Chair overlooked the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not obstruct the public business any more.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts, who has been recognized for five minutes, asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes in addition to that time.

Mr. TREADWAY. No. I have an important matter concerning the war-risk insurance business that I want to submit to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has been recognized for five minutes. He asks unanimous consent to occupy that time out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent in that connection to proceed out of order for five minutes following the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not in order to make the request in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the request is in order. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for five minutes following the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] to proceed out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, my reason for asking five minutes to proceed out of order is to call the attention of members of the committee to a very peculiar situation that has arisen in connection with war-risk insurance matters. As we are probably not to be in session for active business very much in the next week or two, I thought it well to refer to the matter at this time, so that if other similar cases occur among Members of the House in behalf of their constituents those cases can be called to the attention of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who have under consideration a bill (H. R. 8074) which I introduced.

The case which I wish to present is this: A soldier who enlisted in the service nearly two years ago has a wife and four children. He failed to comply with the law to recognize the compulsory allotment under which the wife was entitled to $15 per month of his pay and Government allowance for herself and her children. The department was notified of this compulsory claim and the proper papers were filed as far back as March, 1918. For some reason or other the department failed to get checkage against the man's pay. As a result the matter ran along for more than a year. The man, of course, was overseas and never acknowledged the checkage against his pay. He was discharged in May of this year, has returned to his home, boasts of the fact that his wife never received a cent from him out of his pay, nor did the children receive their entitled allowance. I will not make comment on that man, but my sympathy is with the mother and those children. I took up the matter with the department. It has been before the department for more than a year and brought up to date since the man's discharge. The department now says that because no allotment was ever charged against his pay they have no way of paying this woman what she was entitled to under the law and which she failed to receive through no fault of hers, but through negligence on the part of some employee of the War Risk Insurance Bureau or some officer in the Army. She should have drawn over $1,000 for the support of herself and her four children, but not one cent of that money has been paid. She is an illiterate woman, and the Red Cross of the city where she lives has paid out in support of that family over $1,000, the amount which the soldier should have assigned, both through allotment and allowance to her during this period. Let me read to you a brief extract from the correspondence I have had with the Treasury Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. I called on Secretary Shouse in relation to this matter, and he at once said, "Why, of course that woman has a claim against the Government." He was extremely kind in the matter and gave it his very best attention. Here is what the report to Secretary Shouse says:

The necessary steps as to immediately notifying the enlisted man's commanding officer that checkage should be withheld from his pay for a compulsory class A allotment were not taken, and not until March 24, 1919, was this notice sent.

That was some one's carelessness.

On March 29, 1919, another attempt was made to communicate with Pvt. Beaudry's commanding officer requesting checkage for a compulsory allotment, but no reply has ever been received. In the meantime the enlisted man was discharged from the service.

This is clearly a case of negligence on the part of the bureau to take prompt action in connection with securing checkage in what appears to be a fraud case.

One other sentence:

There appears to be only one course to pursue in this particular, and that is this, that the discharged man be prosecuted in civil courts or else be compelled to pay this allotment. No relief can be had through the bureau since no Government family allowance can be paid unless an allotment of a sufficient amount to warrant has been properly made and paid through this source.

Assistant Secretary Shouse confirms that by saying:

In view of the limitation of the law that prevents the payment of an allowance until the allotment has been paid by the soldier, it would seem that there is no way for the bureau properly to give to the wife of Beaudry the amount which she should have received. Immediate steps should be taken to prosecute the discharged man in the civil courts or else to compel him to pay this allotment.

Of course, prosecution will not bring the money to that poor wife and her four children, and, further, any suit against such a man to compel the payment would be a waste of time and money.

I have therefore introduced an amendment to the war-risk insurance act which provides that in case allotments are not paid, through no fault or negligence of the person to whom the allotment is owed, there shall be a claim against the Government, so that the money can be secured. I trust that if there are other similar cases brought to the attention of the House, Members will notify the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and urge the passage of the amendment to which I refer.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. ROGERS. I have had several instances where married men have enlisted in the Army under assumed names, representing themselves to be unmarried. In such a case, of course, the wife can not trace him. The Army officers have no way of knowing that the man's assertion that he is single is incorrect. In the course of time the man is discharged. I am wondering if the legislation which the gentleman proposes would properly include such cases?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think it certainly should. The wife should not be a loser when she is not at fault.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there could have been no better or surer or more certain way of solving the high cost of living than for this House to have taken its proposed five weeks' recess, as it agreed to do last Monday. We are asked to continue in session for two purposes—one to increase the wages of railway employees another $1,000,000,000 and the other to pass upon the shoe problem.

We are told that unless we raise the wages of the railroad employees another billion dollars annually that there is to be a strike on September 1 from one side of this Nation to the other. And by reason of such threats, ipso facto, Congress must provide the increase. By such threats the four great brotherhoods forced the Adamson law upon Congress and upon the Nation. By such threats the four great brotherhoods during the war forced Director General McAdoo to give them an annual increase of wages of $754,811,000.

Were they satisfied? No. But when Mr. McAdoo, honest statesman that he was, held up his hands to those highwaymen and turned over $754,000,000 and walked out, as soon as his successor was appointed the four great brotherhoods, by just such threats, forced Director General Hines to pay over to them $67,500,000 more annual increase. Eight hundred and twenty-two million three hundred and eleven thousand dollars increase annually in railroad wages forced from all the people through threats.

Were the conductors illy paid at that time? Why, a passenger conductor at that time during the war, before the increase was granted, received $135 to $165 a month for eight hours' work, six days in the week, with time and a half for all time over eight hours. What do they receive now? A passenger conductor receives now an average salary of $180 a month for eight hours a day for six days in the week, with time and a half for all time over eight hours a day.

Are his duties arduous? He rides in a comfortable coach, he eats his meals in the dining car at half price. He has porters to wait on him, and even has an auditor to go around and take the tickets up for him. One hundred and eighty dollars a month average, and yet he comes in like a highwayman and says, "If you do not give the four great brotherhoods $1,000,000,000 more annual increase, we will tie up the traffic of the Nation so tight that we will destroy the railway activities and business of the country," and Congress is going to sit here and truckle. I say the time has come for the tail to quit wagging the dog. Congress must have a showdown and go to the mat with them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes' time.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I must object to any more speeches not confined to the subject matter of the bill. We are trying to get these bills out of the way.

Mr. BURKE. I hope I shall be given time asked for to reply to the false statements just made here and to answer the false reports appearing in the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. FORDNEY. Can not the gentleman get his remarks under the five-minute rule without asking for special time?

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired, unless gentlemen get unanimous consent.

Mr. CROWTHER. I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I object.

Mr. FORDNEY. We have had 10 minutes' debate foreign to the subject of the bill, and I must object to any further speeches not confined to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after line 2, insert a new paragraph as follows:
"Watch crystals, 60 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. FORDNEY. I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I reserve a point of order to the amendment.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen insist on making a point of order, I shall probably not be able to maintain the contention that my amendment is in order, but under the reservation of the point of order I should like to submit a letter which I have received from Hon. Irving H. Chase, of Waterbury, Conn., president of a large manufacturing concern which has gone into the manufacture of watch crystals since the beginning of the war. The letter is as follows:

WATERBURY CLOCK CO.,
WATERBURY, CONN., July 17, 1919.

Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TILSON: I want to bring to your notice the fact that this company is manufacturing watch crystals.

Up to the time of our starting in to produce these goods the United States was dependent upon foreign supply for all that were used in this country.

Efforts at various times have been made to establish the manufacture of watch crystals, but without success.

Watch crystals were made in Switzerland, in France, in Austria, and in Germany, Germany being the largest producer, and the trust or association which has dominated all the European production being controlled by Germany.

We ourselves are large consumers of watch crystals, manufacturing the well-known Ingersoll watch.

At the beginning of the war we realized that the possible shutting off of the supply of crystals would entirely shut off the production of watches, approximately amounting to 4,000,000 per year. We then attempted the manufacture of watch crystals ourselves, and to-day have a fully equipped plant, with complete facilities, including furnaces for the making of the glass itself.

The embarrassment that we foresaw was equally appreciated by the large watchcase manufacturers of the country, but we have been able to meet their demands and have supplied them during the past few years.

In the year 1918 we produced over 14,000,000 crystals.

During the last year we have been confronted with a new, embarrassing, and very discouraging competition, namely, that of Japan, who, during the war, also introduced the manufacture of crystals, and appear as an unexpected competitor. The imports of Japanese crystals in the last 10 months amount to $377,000.

We realize the impossibility of selling our goods in open competition with those made with the low labor cost of the Japanese.

In establishing this industry we were practically dependent upon our own resources for the manufacture of the necessary machinery, and the education of our employees. It being a new industry, there are no skilled operatives that are available.

The hope for a reduction in cost of manufacture following the closing of the war has not materialized, and therefore I ask your interest in our behalf.

Watch crystals have been imported into this country always as "parts of watches." The present duty is 30 per cent, under paragraph 161 of the tariff act of 1913.

I feel that the conditions justify an increase of duty, to give us necessary protection, and would ask that paragraph 161 be amended by the insertion after the words "parts of watches," on the second line, "except watch crystals," and that "watch crystals" be given a separate classification, if necessary, at a rate of at least 60 per cent.

I am hoping that you can consistently indorse my request as justified, and from your position on the Ways and Means Committee have opportunity to further it.

Very truly, IRVING H. CHASE, President.

Mr. Chairman, this letter, written by a man of large affairs, tells the story more eloquently than I can tell it and gives clearly the reasons why the protection is necessary. Unless protection is given this industry must fail. It is an industry that has grown up as the result of the war, and therefore comes within the class of industries which has aroused the solicitude of even President Wilson. If gentlemen will not withdraw the point of order and my amendment goes out, I shall at a later time introduce a separate bill, if necessary, and try to get on the list spoken of by my friend from North Carolina of those having bills reported out to protect industries within their own States.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means and he ought to have gotten in on the ground floor with the others. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan or the gentleman from North Carolina insist upon the point of order?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order for the reason that this bill relates only to chemical and laboratory glassware. Watch crystals are not part of that industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the figures "60" and insert "45."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope that that amendment will be voted down. That puts the matter back where it is under existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I have no idea, no hope, no shadow of expectation that the majority will be considerate enough to put in the very just and moderate rate that I have suggested in my amendment, but I am going to give them the opportunity to vote for it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I certainly sympathize with the gentleman's feelings.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well; let us take a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the demand comes too late.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifteen Members present; a quorum. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Surgical and dental instruments, or parts thereof, made wholly or in part of iron, steel, copper, brass, nickel, aluminum, or other metal, finished or unfinished, 60 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, in line 15, the figures "60" and inserting the figures "45"

The CHAIRMAN The Clerk will report the amendment

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, strike out "60" and insert "45."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the House in any vain attempt to do a very righteous thing. Those figures, of course, ought to be 45. The manufacturers want—not that they say they need—60 per cent, and of course the gentlemen on the Republican side have made up their minds to give them what they want. I ask for a vote.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am ready for a vote. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 40, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all articles provided for in this act shall not be entitled to free entry under paragraph 573 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 17, 18, and 19 on page 2, and if that very just amendment passes I shall then, in order to make my amendment complete, move to amend, at the end of section 2, by adding the words "except paragraph 573 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out all of lines 17, 18, and 19.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to put back into the law—rather, to keep in the present tariff act—the very provision that has been in every tariff act since 1790, with the exception of three—the tariff acts of 1846, 1857, and 1864–1870. My amendment proposes to preserve as it is in the present act the identical paragraph that was in the McKinley Act, the Dingley Act, and in the Payne-Aldrich Act, and now in the Underwood Act. Paragraph 573 of the existing tariff act, which this bill proposes to strike out, exempts educational and scientific institutions from the payment of import duty on chemical glass and optical instruments. That is, articles of this kind purchased by universities, colleges, and other educational institutions for their and the students' use, are now, and have been always, with the exceptions that I have pointed out, admitted free. This bill strikes that section out. I propose by my amendment to keep it in the law. As I tried to show the Committee of the Whole when I made my opening remarks, this bill will levy a tax upon the students of the chemical and scientific departments of the colleges and universities. It is a tax of $900,000 on the students of such departments, or a tax of $13.33 per annum, on an average, upon each student himself. He must take that out of his pocket to pay the increased cost of the articles he must have in his chemical course, which increase is made by this bill. That does not go to help the Treasury; that goes into the pockets of the glass manufacturers of my friend BACHARACH'S district, in New Jersey. If the Republican membership of the House desires to help Mr. BACHARACH'S manufacturing institutions to the amount of $900,000 yearly, by taking it yearly out of the pockets of each one of these struggling students in the chemical and scientific departments of our various colleges and universities—to the extent of $13.33 per student—and transfer that amount to the pockets of two or three of Mr. BACHARACH'S glass manufacturers, well and good; but you ought to know the fact when you vote it. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] says that he would like to know how I get the fact that it would cost each student $13.33. If Mr. LONGWORTH and Mr. BACHARACH will turn to page 25 of the Tariff Commission's report to the Ways and Means Committee of June 3, 1919, on optical glass and chemical glass, they will find that the Tariff Commission wrote to the heads of the chemical departments of 20 different universities and colleges, asking them if the exemption of educational institutions allowed in paragraph 573 of the existing tariff act was repealed and the existing duty of 45 per cent was applied to them, what would the increased cost, by virtue of such repeal, be to each student in their departments.

Let me read what the report says:

The replies of the university men to this question varied. The estimates of increased cost per year per student were as follows: $3 to $5; $5 to $8; $5 to $10; $10 to $20; less than $25; about 25 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask for five minutes more in order to get through with this which is the last amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was simply going to ask the gentleman if he is aware that a large number of educational institutions make no charge whatever to their students?

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, I do not know, because the evidence that they all charge—that is, sell to the student the glass he uses.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I know the gentleman does not know.

Mr. KITCHIN. What college does the gentleman refer to; just name what college the gentleman has in mind that does not charge for these articles?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I simply asked the gentleman if he is not aware that a large number of educational institutions assume the cost themselves and do not charge the students anything.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know any that do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I know the gentleman does not know.

Mr. KITCHIN. And there is no evidence to that effect and the gentleman from Ohio does not know of any. Here is the evidence——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suggest to the gentleman that while they may not charge the students themselves it is not given away by the college.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Would the agricultural and mechanical colleges, the agricultural experiment stations, and so forth, be affected similarly?

Mr. KITCHIN. All would have to pay. I am calling attention now to the Tariff Commission report about the students' cost alone. Here is what the gentleman from Ohio was thinking about when he asked the question. Here is the evidence: One man only before our committee stated that many colleges did not charge a profit to the students. Not that they did not charge the students for the articles, but that they charged no profits. That is in the evidence.

Now, you will find according to the figures given by the commission in the replies of the universities that the average cost, caused by repeal of the exemption clause, is $10 per student per year. That is at the tariff rate of 45 per cent. Now, if we increase it from 45 per cent to 60 per cent, as this bill proposes, you increase the cost 33⅓ per cent. Thirty-three and one-third per cent of $10 is $3.33, which, added to the $10, makes $13.33 per student per year. The agricultural colleges, the agricultural and mechanical institutions of the various States, must pay this 60 per cent if this bill passes. They are now getting these products free of duty. Gentlemen, you may look at it any way you please, but the evidence shows that this bill levies a tax of $13.33 upon each student in the chemical or scientific department of any educational institution, and it is going to cost the students annually $900,000 extra. How do I get at that? The Tariff Board reports that between $1,200,000 and $1,500,000 of this chemical glassware were used by the United States before the war; that 50 per cent of all used in this country is used by the educational institutions—practically all by their students. That is $750,000 used by the colleges and institutions prior to the war. On that basis under the bill they would pay a duty of 60 per cent, amounting to $450,000. The value and production that is now used in the United States is $3,000,000 or more, 50 per cent of which, or $1,500,000, is used in our educational institutions by the students. Sixty per cent tariff duty, provided in this bill, on this million and a half makes $900,000, practically every cent of which must be paid by the students not to the Government but to the tariff favorites in Mr. BACHARACH's district and a few other districts.

Mr. BACHARACH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BACHARACH. I think if the gentleman will read the rest of the statement it will probably give the Members of the committee a little better judgment.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman took the statement away from me.

Mr. BACHARACH. I have returned it.

I want to call attention to the fact that most of the colleges charge from 100 to 200 per cent and, of course, the student has to pay that profit.

Mr. KITCHIN. Here is the evidence. And it—the balance of the report—is exactly as I stated.

Mr. BACHARACH. As a matter of fact, I do not think it cost the student over $5 or $6.

Mr. KITCHIN. I stated that a number of educational institutions, according to the evidence, charge only the actual cost, not as stated by Mr. LONGWORTH that they did not charge the student anything, but they charge only the actual cost. The rest of the report which my friend from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] asked me to read is to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I wish I could have time to read more from the Tariff Commission's report. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Do gentlemen on that side desire any more light and information on the subject? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not the kind of light that the gentleman is attempting to give us.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to give the gentleman from North Carolina a little light direct——

Mr. KITCHIN. All right; that will be a phenomenon, and I am ready to accept it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Here is what a gentleman said who appeared before our committee representing the colleges——

Mr. KITCHIN. Who is that man; I am trying to find out?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Parsons. Mr. Sheridan, of the Tariff Commission, in quoting from the manufacturer, states:

Some schools charge net prices, but the majority add from 100 to 200 per cent to the cost, which was not intended by the Government when the law was passed. In other words, a great many schools compel the students to pay the entire operating expenses of the laboratory supply department by adding a profit to the duty-free prices. One large western university pays interest on the equipment of the storeroom and the running expenses of same, including the salary of the purchasing agent, and shows a profit. We do not know of any that charge the actual cost price. The spirit and literal interpretation of the duty-free law has been broken by a great many schools in checking up the apparatus used by instructors and students in allowing the same to be carried away from the institution. Some of the duty-free goods have been disposed of by the laboratories.

Now, the gentleman was asked a question by Mr. HULL of Tennessee.

Mr. HULL. Does your organization represent chemists of the universities?

Mr. PARSONS. Probably every chemical professor and most all of the chemical instructors in all the universities of America. I say probably; I know it; there is no question but that they are all members of the American Chemical Society. And in this organization large numbers of those were present and there was very little dissent among those present as to the desirability of this action.

Mr. COLLIER. You say those connected with these universities and colleges were there and approved of this proposition?

Mr. PARSONS. They were there and favored it; yes, sir. There were representatives from Cornell, Yale, the University of California, the University of Pennsylvania, Columbia University—I can get a list if it would be of any interest. But it is practically the most representative chemical organization that can be gotten together in America, composed of representatives elected by the local sections. We have 55 local sections in America, which are very largely controlled by the colleges and universities.

Mr. COLLIER. And I understood you to say, in answer to a question from Mr. OLDFIELD, this association is in no way, directly or indirectly, connected with the manufacture?

Mr. PARSONS. It is a scientific association which does not make a cent of money from any person, individual, firm, or corporation. It is only a scientific association, the same as the Association of Mechanical Engineers, the Association of Civil Engineers, etc. It is an association gotten together for the development of the chemical science and industry.

Mr. YOUNG. If I understood you correctly, your main purpose is to secure a dependable supply for all time to come in this country?

Mr. PARSONS. That is it exactly.

Now, does the gentleman want any better information than that? The very institutions he is talking about are up here where Republicans live and are not down in North Carolina. Do not feel so badly about it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I wish to say that the star witness you put on was from North Carolina, and Mr. BACHARACH was so proud of it that he spoke in his speech about it, and said that this fellow was from North Carolina.

Mr. FORDNEY. The star witness and dyed-in-the-wool Democrat came here and asked for protection, did he not? [Applause on the Republican side.] He was an intelligent fellow. You have only a few like him.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all provisions of any act or acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Strike out the period in the last line of section 2 and insert the following:

Except paragraph 573 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to enlighten the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] a minute.

Mr. FORDNEY. Tell us about some North Carolina protectionists.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right. Of course, gentlemen, I do not know what Dr. Herty's politics is, whether he is a Republican or Democrat. Suppose he was a Democrat. Nobody ever heard me say that we did not have some Democrats at some time that were as bad as Republicans are all the time. [Laughter.] I do not know the politics of every man who labels himself a Democrat, but if Dr. Herty came before our committee and advocated "on his own hook" a 60 per cent tariff, with the exemption clause eliminated, he is not a good Democrat, whether he comes from North Carolina or Michigan or New York.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But he is an intelligent Democrat.

Mr. KITCHIN. But you must remember, whether he used to be a Democrat or not, that when Dr. Herty came here and said he did not know anything about the tariff at all, but that he was in favor of the 60 per cent asked for by the manufacturers, he had left North Carolina five years before, and was then living, I think, in New Jersey, in Mr. BACHARACH's State. [Laughter.]

I have told our good Democrats in North Carolina that they had better stay home, because just as soon as they go up somewhere and mix with none but tariff plunderers they are going to go wrong. [Laughter.] Of course, when Dr. Herty got up here and associated with these glass manufacturers and tariff robbers, like my genial friend BACHARACH, he went wrong. [Laughter.]

But now about the colleges. Why, they said, "Here is this fellow Dr. Parsons, that represents all the colleges and all the educational and scientific institutions, and he said he was perfectly willing, and that they were all perfectly willing, to have the exemption clause eliminated." Who is Dr. Parsons? A college man? Oh, No. A university man? No.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have but five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Just one question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Do not interrupt me now.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to tell you who Dr. Parsons is.

Mr. KITCHIN. He lives in Washington City. He is the secretary of some chemical society. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can run a fine-tooth comb through all the universities and colleges of the thousands we have and you will find some fellow just as unjust, just as unwise, just as unpatriotic as my good friends and colleagues FORDNEY and BACHARACH are [laughter], and who wants to tax the students 60 per cent, or $900,000 on the glassware they must use for the benefit of some tariff barons. You will find some at the colleges and universities. But most of them are against it.

The Tariff Commission says that it wrote the heads of the chemical department in 20 of the leading universities of the country and asked them whether the repeal of the duty-free privilege would sufficiently benefit the chemical industry as to justify the repeal, and out of the 20 only 8 of them replied that it would be justified, while 12 were against it and stood with my position. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But, gentlemen, while they tell us that this or that man or witness represents the educational institutions and is in favor of the repeal let it be understood that there is not a word of evidence that one of the students, who must pay the taxes, who must take out of his pocket each year $13.33 and turn it over to the pockets of Mr. BACHARACH's constituent manufacturers, has advocated the repeal. Not one of them has come before our committee and urged repeal. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, very briefly let me say that Dr. Herty is the editor of a chemical journal. The gentleman from North Carolina says Dr. Herty went to New Jersey and there became—oh, well, enamored with Republicanism. You say he is a resident of Washington. He is here at the request of the President and is a member of one of the war boards. Did you not know that?

Mr. KITCHIN. I took what was testified to.

Mr. FORDNEY. The President never was known to call a full-fledged, dyed-in-the-wool Republican to his assistance. The North Carolina Democrats had to go to New Jersey for a President.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Further reserving the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say with regard to Dr. Parsons, who has been mentioned, that whether he be or be not, as I do not know, secretary of some chemical society, he is the chief chemist of the Bureau of Mines, operating directly under the supervision of that very fine Democrat, Mr. Lane.

Mr. KITCHIN. You gentlemen do not object to my saying just what Dr. Parsons said? Mr. FORDNEY asked him a question, and he said, "My home is in Washington." Mr. FORDNEY asked him, "Where do you live? What do you do?" He said, "My home is in Washington. I am secretary of the American Chemical Society." He said that. That is all I said.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The reservation of the point of order is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me have just one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, just let me state that on that vote on the amendment exempting students and colleges and educational institutions from the payment of import duty on chemical glass and optical glass and instruments all the Democrats here voted for the amendment and all the Republicans here voted against the amendment and for the tariff tax on the educational institutions and on the students. I just wanted to make that statement to keep the record straight.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it be passed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to hear the report of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that there is no quorum in the House. We have not had a quorum in the House all day.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman can not make the point in that way.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not insist on his point.

Mr. BLANTON. We ought to stay here; the men who stay here ought to be here. I want to see a quorum here of the men who have been objecting to the recess.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman withhold his point a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold it.

Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7785) to provide revenue for the Government, to establish and maintain in the United States the manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, optical glass, scientific and surgical instruments, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reports that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7785) to provide revenue for the Government, to establish and maintain in the United States the manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, optical glass, scientific and surgical instruments, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] will not insist upon his point of no quorum. I have much the same feeling that the gentleman has about it, but the gentleman would be taking out his resentment upon all these Members here——

Mr. BLANTON. I did not withdraw my point for that. We have been asked to stay here and transact business, and the men who required us to stay here ought to be here.

Mr. KITCHIN. The President is the one who required us to be here. You are not punishing the President at all.

Mr. BLANTON. I believe we ought to have a quorum here, and I insist on my point, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, can we not move the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. No other business is in order. A call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 250 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. KINCHELOE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks for the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-six Members, not a sufficient number.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I ask for the other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no other side. The question is, Are the yeas and nays demanded by one-fifth of those present?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The Speaker announced 26 Members, not a sufficient number.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum present.

Mr. FORDNEY. I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting] A quorum is present. The yeas and nays are refused. The bill is passed.

On motion of Mr. FORDNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. BOOHER, for 30 days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BLAND of Missouri, indefinitely, on account of the illness of his wife.

To Mr. ALEXANDER, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. SISSON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BANKHEAD, for two weeks, in order to visit his district.

To Mr. ASHBROOK, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. BRAND, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. HASTINGS, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Nebraska, indefinitely, on account of important business.

INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 80 and consider the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of Senate joint resolution 80, to authorize the President to convene a meeting of an international labor conference in Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to convene and to make arrangements for the organization of a general international labor conference, to be held in Washington, D. C.: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall be held to authorize the President to appoint any delegates to represent the United States of America at such conference or to authorize the United States of America to participate therein unless and until the Senate shall have ratified the provisions of the proposed treaty of peace with Germany with reference to a general international labor conference.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the treaty now pending in the Senate provides among other things for an international labor conference to be held in Washington in October. The President is anxious to make the preliminary arrangements for that conference, and the Senate resolution now before us grants that authority, with provision, however, that no American delegates shall be appointed to the conference unless and until the treaty of peace shall have been ratified by the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. BLANTON. Would this resolution, if passed, and if there should be such a conference, authorize Lenin and Trotski to appear as delegates from Russia? If it would, I will object to it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will have to ask some one else for information on that point.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

THREE-DAY RECESSES.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it was the almost unanimous opinion of the Members of the House that the work of the Congress would be expedited by a recess, which was proposed and provided for in a concurrent resolution. That recess would have given the committees an opportunity to proceed with their work unhampered by the necessity of attending daily sessions of the House. Communications received from the President seemed to make it wise and advisable to rescind the action relative to that adjournment or recess. Members, however, prior to rescinding the action which had been taken, had made arrangements to go home for a short time, at least many of them, and they will be very greatly inconvenienced if they can not now proceed upon their journey. I think we practically all agree that for the immediate future the important work before the committees will be expedited and promoted if the House is not held in daily session. I would not suggest that we have any agreement whereby a recess of the House shall be provided for, or agreed upon, beyond the period when the President has suggested that he might present certain matters to Congress, or beyond the time when the committees now acting may be prepared to present matters requiring action to the House. I think it is true, however, that under the circumstances we shall expedite the public business if we can arrange for recesses from day to day or for three days at a time for a short time, allowing the Members to go home for a brief period, at least. I therefore ask unanimous consent for a recess of the House from to-night until next Tuesday, and from Tuesday until Friday, and a continuation of such recesses until such time as the membership may be notified by the floor leaders on either side of the necessity of a quorum; and that in the meantime no business be taken up when the House meets on Tuesdays and Fridays.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield long enough for me to make a request and ask the Speaker for unanimous consent for the consideration——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am making a request, and it is for any gentleman to object if he wishes to do so.

Mr. IGOE. I simply ask the gentleman to yield to me to submit a request.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will have abundant opportunity to submit a request later. The granting of this request does not take from any gentleman the right to make a request.

Mr. IGOE. Does the gentleman refuse to yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I have the floor only by unanimous consent; I have no right to yield. If I attempted to yield to the gentleman, it would be necessary to yield to other gentlemen who, I have no doubt, would be glad to submit requests of one sort or another. It would not be fair for me to yield to one and not to another.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman include in his request a proposition to have the Speaker sign any bills that may be presented, inasmuch as several bills have passed the House?

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman for calling attention to that, and I desire to add not only authority to sign bills but authority for the Speaker to refer bills and messages that may come in during the recess of the House.

Let me make this suggestion: I do not anticipate that we can expect, if this agreement is made to recess, without a demand for a quorum for more than two weeks. I do not know that conditions would arise in two weeks that would demand a quorum, but I should expect to consult the minority leader and to agree with him to issue a call whenever he believed that it should be done, and I think that we should understand that in view of the suggestions in the President's letters and of the legislation that may arise out of those suggestions that there may be important business before the House in two weeks.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In fairness to Members who live some distance away, I would like to state to the majority leader that in 15 minutes the train leaves Washington upon which those Members who live in the Southwest in the direction of St. Louis have been expecting to depart. The transportation reservations we purchased had to be turned in three hours before the train left in order to have our money refunded. The railroad situation is in such a congested condition that you can not get new transportation reservations under three days. In other words, you can not get accommodations for the Southwest and Texas under three days' advance. Therefore if we only have an agreement for a recess for the next two weeks and can not leave before Tuesday or Wednesday, what good is it going to do Members who live 2,000 miles away?

Mr. MONDELL. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Texas that I am sure he would not want to remain away——

Mr. BLANTON. I do not understand that there is any provision that we should be given three days' notice, and it takes three days to come from my home here.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Texas and no other gentleman on that side would want to remain at home after the minority floor leader had notified him that his presence was needed.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; certainly not. But the rights and conveniences of Members who live 2,000 miles away, and who seldom get an opportunity to go home and visit their constituents, should be given more consideration when these short recesses are arranged. Until an hour ago I had my ticket and reservation to leave on this 4.50 train, and now can not go. Others are in the same fix. It is quite exasperating.

Mr. MONDELL. I am sure no gentleman on this side would remain at home after he was notified by the majority floor leader that it was deemed advisable to call for a quorum. In that event an effort would be made to give Members reasonable notice. I think they ought to have a notice of three days, if possible.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman be willing to include that in the request?

Mr. MONDELL. All I can say to the gentleman is that we will give the longest notice possible under the conditions that might arise—three days, if possible.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to state my understanding of the matter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Md. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

M. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that during these three-day recesses the committees or the subcommittees having charge of the matters to which the President's letters related will have those matters under consideration.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. The committees will be constantly in session, and, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] knows, the committees will be able to do very much better work and do much more work with the House in recess than they could with the House in session.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am sure that is true; and now it is understood when these committees are ready to report, or when the President is ready to make his specific recommendation, or in any other emergency unforeseen, the gentleman and the minority leader will at once give notice to Members to come here.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what I have in mind, and that is what would be done. I want to say that I would give the notice upon our side at any time that the minority leader believes there should be a call for a quorum.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question. If it should turn out to be the fact that the President should veto the daylight-saving bill, and that veto message comes here, will it automatically go to the committee, or will it lie on the table, or can it be taken up and considered?

Mr. MONDELL. It would have to be referred to the committee, I assume, to be taken up as soon as the House reconvenes. Of course, a presidential veto might be one of those things that would require a reconvening of the House, although I do not assume that the veto that the gentleman has in mind, if it should occur, to our regret, would make it necessary to call the House immediately in session, but would be pending, to be acted upon within a reasonable time.

Mr. SIMS. That was my thought, that it would go to the committee and not be called up until the House met again.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] that nobody has objected to his resolution——

Mr. IGOE. All I want is one minute.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that anyone will. I shall not, but I can not yield to couple with my request other requests, because a half dozen gentlemen at least would desire to have that done.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. In the event of a veto or vetoes it seems to me the unanimous agreement might be that the message covering the veto should be referred to the committee from which it originated.

Mr. MONDELL. That would be the action taken under the request that I have made, that messages may be appropriately referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, all that I have asked all day is permission to ask the Speaker for unanimous consent, and I want the majority leader to agree that I may have that privilege, to consider a resolution authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the price of shoes. I do not see why anyone should want to object to that. It will take only two minutes to get it through this House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, nobody has objected. The gentleman has never made that request. It is not my province to say whether the gentleman shall prefer a request to the Speaker. I have made no objection and no one else has, so far as I know. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], who is in charge of the bill——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. IGOE. Then I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting resolutions adopted by the Savannah Commercial Club indorsing the league of nations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein resolutions adopted by the Savannah Commercial Club indorsing the league of nations. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TUESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock meridian Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at noon on Tuesday next.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman arise?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the correspondence with Julius Barnes, president of the United States Grain Corporation, in regard to the administration of the grain guaranty act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing correspondence with Julius Barnes relative to the handling of the wheat situation. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we can not hear what the request is.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Igoe resolution——

The SPEAKER. There is one unanimous consent pending.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is it?

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Ohio to extend his remarks.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am perfectly willing to withhold.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I shall object to it; who is it? I withdraw mine.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Igoe resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws his objection. There is pending a unanimous consent that the Chair again will state. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing in the RECORD correspondence with Julius Barnes relative to the wheat situation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a resolution adopted by the Commercial Club of Savannah indorsing the league of nations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman extending his remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution of the Savannah, Ga., club indorsing the league of nations?

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the Igoe resolution about boots and shoes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution about boots and shoes? Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if we have to agree to every resolution anybody wants to pass, in order to get this recess, I think we had better not have the recess.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Nobody is asking for but one resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman for the present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The regular order is putting my request.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair did not recognize the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did not recognize me?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What went with the request I made that the gentleman from Missouri could call up his resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not obliged to state it unless he desires.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman to present a request.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did the Chair recognize me or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And I made the request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not obliged to recognize the gentleman to prefer a request——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, my understanding was——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I offer the following report and ask that it be printed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-two gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri and Mr. HEFLIN demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 68.

So the motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Tuesday, August 5, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Also, petition of the National Tuberculosis Association, opposing repeal of daylight-saving law; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of the Polish National Alliance of the United States of North America, opposing Senate bill 2099; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. KELLEY of Michigan: Resolution of clerks and carriers of the National Federation of Postal Employees, at Flint, Mich., protesting against the inadequacy of existing wage scale of postal employees, and requesting that they be granted an immediate increase of $500 a year, beginning July 1, 1919, and a substantial increase to substitute clerks, carriers, and temporary help; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. McGLENNON: Petition of Tiffany Council, No. 270, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Union Hill, N. J., favoring six months' pay to the discharged soldiers; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin: Petition of the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor, relative to cost of living; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. O'CONNELL: Petition of John McE. Bowan, opposing Senate bills 2199 and 2202 and House bill 6310; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of the American Federation of Labor, of Washington, D. C., by Frank Morrison, favoring an increase in salaries of the postal clerks; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin: Resolution of the Federation of Labor of the State of Wisconsin, requesting that steps be taken to reduce the cost of living; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial of the Common Council of the City of Milwaukee, Wis., to enact legislation to curb the increased cost of living, and to do away with all combinations which tend to enhance the cost of living, especially the cost of fuel, clothing, and foodstuffs; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ROWAN: Petition of John McE. Bowman, of New York City, protesting against Senate bill 2202; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of the Institute of American Meat Packers, 22 West Monroe Street, Chicago, Ill., opposing the Kenyon bill relating to the packing industry; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of the American Federation of Labor, favoring an increase for the clerks in the Postal Service; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. SCHALL: Resolution of Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, indorsing petition and bill introduced by Hon. F. F. ELLSWORTH (H. R. 6461); to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SINCLAIR: Petition of Jamestown Commercial Club, Jamestown, N. Dak., protesting against the repeal of the zone system; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of Joseph & Hoenck, Oliver Denis, Max Stern, A. L. Moody, O. J. de Lendrecie Co., the Black Co., Fred W. Kruse Co., E. A. Ricker Co., and Herbst department store, all of Fargo, N. Dak., asking for the repeal of section 900, subdivision 19, of the internal-revenue law; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: Resolutions adopted by the Hitt Mountain Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, of Weiser, Idaho, protesting against the transfer of the Forestry Service from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, resolutions adopted by the Hitt Mountain Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, of Weiser, Idaho, favoring the enactment of legislation as to public domain; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee: Petition of Anderson-Dulin-Varnell Co., of Knoxville, Tenn., for the repeal of the luxury tax law; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TINKHAM: Petition of Charlestown Lodge, No. 876, of Charlestown, Mass., favoring the establishing of a 44-hour week as the standard of employment for the employees of the Boston Navy Yard; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. WINSLOW: Petition of F. E. Thompson & Co., for the repeal of the tax on sodas, soft drinks, and ice cream; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 4, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray Thee to help us not only to give thoughtful consideration, but prayerful consideration, to the mighty issues that press upon us. We look out upon the needs of millions. Much of their interest has been committed to our hands. We pray that we may draw from Thee the wisdom and grace which will enable us properly to discern the divine plan and will, and to execute Thy plan and will for this Nation. Guide us this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore (Mr. CUMMINS) took the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) to authorize the President to convene a meeting of an international labor conference in Washington, D. C.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 7110. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across Flint River, in the State of Georgia;

H. R. 7785. An act to provide revenue for the Government, to establish and maintain in the United States the manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, optical glass, scientific and surgical instruments; and

H. J. Res. 165. Joint resolution to allow the payment of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 7, 66th Cong., H. R. 5527).

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have a letter from Mr. H. N. Owen, editor of the Farm, Stock and Home. It is a personal letter written to me, but it has reference to the production of grain and prices, and I wish to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 29, 1919.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As a representative of the North Dakota wheat growers I feel that you will be vitally interested in the inclosed, being a copy of the front page of our August 1 issue, also editorial comment on same.

The developments of the wheat crop are bringing me around to your position—that the thing to do is to get rid of this guaranty just as quickly as we can and let the law of supply and demand prevail. Thirty days ago I would not have favored this, but at this time, with the crop going back every day and with about an 80,000,000-bushel loss in Kansas in June, it is becoming quite evident to me that 900,000,000 bushels will be about our maximum.

In June Mr. Julius Barnes estimated that on a 1,100,000,000-bushel crop for this country the world would have a carry-over at the end of the 1919 crop year of about 40,000,000 bushels. Now, if I am right in my estimate of our final returns, using Mr. Barnes's own figures, which I also inclose, we won't have enough wheat to go around. This being so, I believe it would be perfectly safe to get wheat back onto the unrestricted market and let the law of supply and demand prevail.

You are of course aware of the fact that ever since the signing of the armistice wheat in Minneapolis has been selling higher than the Government price, and has been continually advancing, until now certain grades are over $3, and there isn't any kind of wheat that isn't selling at 25 cents over the Government guaranteed price. Out of this the farmers are getting nothing. Either the Grain Corporation is making the money or the line elevators. Now, I maintain that this is an intolerable situation—a situation that I feel will prevail to some extent all during the 1919 crop year. I believe that Minneapolis September wheat to-day would be selling better than $2.60 in an open market. You have probably noticed that Winnipeg October wheat was selling for $2.47. This corresponds to Minneapolis September wheat. The normal difference between Minneapolis and Winnipeg is from 12 to 15 cents. Calling it 13 cents a bushel, we have $2.60 as a probable September price in Minneapolis.

Now then, must our producers stand for selling their wheat at $2.21½ Minneapolis, less 8 cents handling charges, which the Grain Corporation has announced they will allow elevators, and freight. This is going to bring the price of Red River Valley wheat down to less than $2. Western North Dakota wheat, where they have all the way from nothing to 8 or 9 bushels, will be 5 or 6 cents less than the most distant Red River Valley point. Then if this wheat is going to sell in Minneapolis 25 or 30 cents more than the Government price, which profit will be made either by the Grain Corporation or the line elevators, there will be a condition produced that will lead to far-reaching political consequences.

I am being batted from all sides, and all sorts of pressure is being brought to bear on me to lay off on this wheat fight. I am losing advertising on account of it. The interests affected are out after my scalp, but I am not going to lay off of it. If I did, I wouldn't be true to the interests of the farmers of the Northwest.

Very truly, yours, H. N. OWEN.

Mr. GRONNA. I also have an editorial appearing on the front page of the paper, Farm, Stock and Home, under the heading, "Whose money?" The editorial calls attention to the fact that the Government of the United States during the year 1918 made nearly $24,000,000 out of the wheat crop. I want to have this editorial printed in the RECORD to show that the Government has lost no money in the handling of the wheat crop of the farmers.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHOSE MONEY?

Mr. Julius Barnes has made an official statement to the effect that in 1918 the United States Grain Corporation made net $23,000,000.

What was done with it?

How was this money made?

Did it not come out of the wheat growers?

How much did this $23,000,000 help the consumer?

Did the law creating the United States Grain Corporation authorize making a profit?

How much has the Grain Corporation made so far in 1919 out of the big advance in wheat over the guaranteed price?

How much will the avowed intention of Mr. Julius Barnes to see that the farmer does not get more than the guaranteed price make the Grain Corporation on the 1919 crop?

These are all questions that the wheat growers are entitled to have answered.

If they are not answered voluntarily and satisfactorily, Farm, Stock and Home will demand a congressional investigation. Its duty to the farmers of the Northwest makes such a demand imperative.

HARRY N. OWEN, Publisher.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if I may add a word, I also want to say that I have been receiving a great many letters with reference to the price of wheat and with reference to the high cost of living. I regret to say that I have not yet discovered any remedy for the high cost of living, but I do not think it can be remedied simply by adding to and increasing wages and adding to and increasing everything that is to be bought and sold and by working shorter hours. I am somewhat old-fashioned, Mr. President, and I hardly believe that that is a panacea for these ills. It is suggested that we should have Government ownership or Government control. Never in the history of this country have the consumers had to pay higher prices for certain articles, which I shall not take the time of the Senate to enumerate, but which I could if I desired, than during the time when the distinguished gentleman from—I do not know where he is from; I believe he is from California—Mr. Hoover, was at the head of the so-called food department. Never in the history of the country, I say, have the corporations of the country dealing in food products made as much money and as great profits as have been made under the licensing system of Mr. Hoover. I refer now especially to the packers.

I wish to state, Mr. President, that I have given notice to the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to meet to-morrow, and perhaps some Member or the members of the committee will be able to devise some plan to help reduce the high cost of living and to relieve the American people.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to an editorial in the New York Sun, in which the writer seems to lay the whole trouble of the high cost of living to the high price that was fixed upon wheat. He seems to think that wheat is the chief product of food in the world and that when we fixed the high price of wheat, the price of corn and other food products naturally sought the same level. He seems to think that the way to start reducing the high cost is to start by reducing the price of wheat. I should like to know what the Senator thinks about that.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Government is to fix prices it must, in order to relieve the public from unduly high prices, fix the price of all commodities. I certainly have no objection to reducing the price of wheat if the price is reduced on other articles of food or on articles that we wear, but I wish to say to the Senator from Nevada that I believe, and I think I can prove without any question, that wheat is to-day the cheapest article of food that the American public buys.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me read this article to the Senator, because if he is going to have a committee meeting to-morrow I should like to have him call it to the attention of the committee:

LET THOSE WHO SCREWED UP FOOD COSTS SCREW THEM DOWN.

The Washington administration screwed up the cost of all food when it nailed the price of wheat high above its real value. We mean, of course, when it nailed up that price to the consuming public.

Because the United States Government must buy all the farmers' wheat on the basis of $2.26 the Washington administration is trying to sell that wheat to the American consumer at grossly inflated figures as if there were a wheat famine, when there will be on its hands at least half a billion bushels of wheat which this country can not consume and the greater part of which the Government will never be able to sell abroad.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I wish to be fair to the administration. It is hardly fair to criticize the administration and say that there is inflation in the price of wheat. Both Senators from Minnesota, I think, will bear me out in the statement that wheat is selling for $3 a bushel in Minneapolis now, and in nearly all terminal markets it is selling far above the price at which the President fixed it. So the article is not true. The price of wheat was not inflated. The price fixed by the President was not an inflation, I will say to the Senator, and it never has been since it was fixed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was aware that the Senator knew more about the situation than most Senators and I wanted his opinion on the question.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator excuse me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PITTMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. KELLOGG. There never has been a time, from the day Congress considered the subject of the price of wheat, when wheat was not higher in the market than the Government price or any price discussed in Congress. It is selling to-day for more than the Government fixed the price in this country. I do not say that the price of flour has not a good deal to do with it. It has, as far as that is the food of the people, increased the cost of living, but everything else is the same.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. The price of labor and all that enters into the production of wheat is abnormally high, as is usually the case during and after a war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question. Is it not a fact that the high price of wheat to which we have gone is due to the fact that the Government guaranteed the price of $2.26 per bushel and is manipulating the market to keep it up to that figure?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; it is not the fact. The Government is not manipulating the market.

Mr. KIRBY. What is this man Barnes doing who is regulating the price of wheat to-day?

Mr. GRONNA rose.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will let the Senator from North Dakota answer.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield. I am only seeking information.

Mr. GRONNA. I can answer the Senator from Arkansas. Mr. Julius Barnes, who is the Grain Director now, has been criticized by people in all the grain States for making every effort possible to bear down the price of wheat. I hold no brief for Mr. Barnes, but I think Mr. Barnes will say to the Senator from Arkansas that he has made every effort possible to reduce the price of wheat. He made an effort to import wheat from Canada, but unfortunately Canada had very little wheat to sell. If the Senator from Arkansas will take the trouble, he can easily discover that instead of having a 1,250,000,000-bushel wheat crop this year this country will not have to exceed 850,000,000 bushels of wheat. There is a shortage of wheat throughout the whole world, and the United States will not be able to furnish all the wheat that will be needed in the European countries.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether the fixing of the price of wheat at $2.26 a bushel really produces the high price of flour? Is it not a fact that the price of flour does not bear a real relation to the price per bushel of the wheat itself and that the Government does not in any wise control the difference between what the people have to pay for flour and what the farmer gets for his wheat. Is there not the wide increase in price after it leaves the farm and before it reaches the consumer, and has the price of wheat really brought about that increase? That is the real question.

Mr. GRONNA. I feel that I am imposing on the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Not at all. I am just seeking for information.

Mr. GRONNA. This is a very important subject and the question raised by the Senator from Florida is a very important one. Let me say to the Senator that on the 16th day of May I took occasion to go to a certain city, which I shall not name, and rye was selling in the terminal in the very market where the flour was ground for $1.44 a bushel. I had a wholesale grocer call up the flour mills and ask the wholesale price of a carload of flour, and the price given was $9.60. I undertake to say that there was a gross profit upon rye flour in that case of more than $4 a barrel. I undertake to say that during Mr. Hoover's administration the price of flour was out of proportion to the price of wheat. I undertake to say that never in the history of the country have the millers profited more than they did under Hoover's administration.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. In reference to the wheat question I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to two facts. First, the Canadian Government has agreed to take over all the wheat raised in that country, and they have practically wiped out by that system the grain exchange at Winnipeg and other points in the Dominion. In other words, we are not threatened with an influx of Canadian grain into this country, for the reason that the Canadian Government has taken it over.

In the next place, the speculative price that has prevailed lately in the markets of Minneapolis arises, I think, from these facts: It is now apparent that a large amount of the present spring wheat crop will be of an inferior grade, owing partly to blight, partly to what we call the black rust, and to other causes. Even some of the winter wheat is of an inferior grade. The Minneapolis millers are now reaching out in every direction to get all the wheat they can, not of the present crop but of the old crop which is still in store, and they are bidding high prices to get that wheat for milling purposes. That, I think, is one of the causes that have made prices abnormal at Minneapolis at the present time.

I can not entirely approve of the action of the millers in some respects. I recall, for instance, that while the regulations of Mr. Hoover as to the price of flour and of feed stuffs were in force, feed stuffs, mill stuffs, such as bran and shorts and middlings, were sold, I think, in round figures—I can not be exact—for 30 cents a hundred at the mill to farmers; but as soon as the Hoover embargo was removed, while the price of wheat from which these mill stuffs were manufactured was the same, and while the cost of manufacturing was the same, the millers immediately increased their prices to from 40 to 60 cents a hundred, and even higher. I think that was wholly unjustifiable.

What they have done recently in reference to the price of flour I do not know, but I am satisfied that under present conditions control by the Government of the price of wheat is of no value whatsoever. I think that the amount of wheat in this country of the present crop will be not anywhere near what we expected it to be. The wheat will not be for milling purposes so good a crop as we had last year. It will be far less in the number of bushels produced and inferior in grade and quality to the wheat crop of last year.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, if the relative value of flour, the manufactured article, to the raw wheat does not bear about the same proportion now as it did under prewar conditions? Taking the cost of wheat to-day and comparing it to the cost of the finished product, is not the price of the manufactured flour in relation to the price of the wheat about the same that it was under prewar conditions?

Mr. GRONNA. During the war, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, there was a relatively higher price for flour than there was before the war. I do not know the price of flour to-day.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I was under the impression—merely endeavoring to remember what was the market quotation—that to-day the relative price of flour per barrel in relation to the cost of wheat was about on a parity with the prewar relation. I think it is important to ascertain that fact.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from South Carolina that under the standardization act Government control to a certain extent, I might say—and as to that I believe even the Senators from Minnesota will agree with me—is not satisfactory to the farmers of the Northwest, at least. They complained bitterly, as Senators know, against many of the commercial bodies, and they all say that conditions are worse to-day than they were before.

What I want to say to the Senator from South Carolina is this: Throughout the grain States a great deal of light wheat has been produced, and the farmers are not getting $2.20 a bushel for that wheat. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] can tell the Senate what the farmers of his State are receiving for such wheat. I understand that the purchasers of that wheat are paying farmers as low as $1.13 per bushel, because the wheat is shrunken and light.

Mr. CAPPER. That is a fact. Farmers are getting as low as $1.13 for wheat in Kansas.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to ask what is becoming of this cheap wheat that is being bought at that price under the standardization act? The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has always been helpful to me and to the wheat farmers; he has always made every effort to help the wheat farmers as much as he has helped the cotton farmers. I undertake to say that, per pound, some of this wheat which is bringing only $1.13 to-day has as high a food value as has wheat which is graded as No. 1. There is more gluten per bushel in a bushel of light-weight wheat and less starch, and that fact makes such wheat more valuable as food. I do not find any statement to the effect that the wheat for which the millers are paying but $1.13 a bushel, when manufactured into flour, is being thrown upon the market at a low price. The consumer pays a price based upon the highest standard of wheat. That has been the complaint which I have tried to bring before the Senate; and yet one of the ablest Senators on this floor thought it was very strange that I desired established in the Agricultural Department a small mill to grind wheat into flour and also to have a small bakery established there in order to be able to ascertain the real milling and baking value of grain. That is one of the most important questions to the consumer, but while Congress has made an effort to solve the question the Agricultural Department has not done so.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will allow me, so far as the price of wheat, of a certain grade, at the present time is concerned, that is fixed by the Government, and, therefore, the price of the finished article must be governed by that price as a minimum. What I should like to state to the Senate is that, although the exigencies of war may have justified the attempt upon the part of the Government to control prices, I think it is the duty of the Senate and of the Congress, now that the war has passed, to give the people of this country some opportunity to settle their affairs amongst themselves, without coming to Congress for panaceas for all evils and ills that may arise in the commercial and trading world. It seems to me that if we would take a calm view of the situation we would understand that the hysteria now prevalent has come naturally from conditions over which none of us has any control and which an attempt on our part to control now will be as disastrous as during the period of the war.

Then there was seemingly a necessity for it. Now, in this democratic Government, with men untrammeled in the marts of trade, it is a sad commentary upon their ability and common sense to say that they must run to Congress for relief whenever an emergency arises in the trade between man and man. I am sorry to see that the papers throughout the country are seemingly encouraging an idea that is fraught with untold danger to the American people. I would welcome it if they would say to the American people, "These are problems at your very doors. The man who sells you bread is a citizen of the United States and you who purchase it are citizens of the United States. Why can you not exercise common sense and reach an understanding and not come to Congress and seek artificial laws which, operating upon the real conditions of life, will work out in disaster?" Surely, some of us here can understand that trade will ultimately seek its level and adjust itself along the line of common sense and fair dealing.

We who are sitting here in the Congress can not understand the conditions existing throughout the whole country; they are as diverse as is the geography of the United States. I have waited in the hope that perhaps some of the Representatives from different sections would rise and utter their protest against this seeming tendency to run to Congress and ask it to pass laws to regulate everything. Democracy is not socialism, nor is it communism; democracy is the right of each individual, under humane laws, to work out his own salvation according to his own ability.

There is a great cry against the high cost of living, and there is no doubt that it is high; but while I was sitting on the plaza in front of my hotel last evening there was not the space of a minute when there was not an automobile crowded with citizens of this city out pleasure riding, although gasoline is up to 30 cents a gallon and automobiles are unusually high in price. Yet people are crying "hard times" and the "high cost of living," when the cost of high living is really the trouble. Go to the moving-picture theaters and you will find them crowded to the doors.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wonder if the Senator will argue that extravagance is present in governmental affairs as well as in the private walks of life and that the Government has been engaged in an orgy of expenditure no less than the people whose automobiles the Senator saw last night.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I suspect that has been true for a time as to which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. There was some little excuse for what seemed to be extravagance on the part of the Government during the menace of the war but surely the American people are intelligent enough to know that they have the power in their hands to regulate from the shop to the consumer some of these questions. We, however, are teaching the American people to run to Congress for everything, rather than insisting that questions which ought to be settled amongst themselves or at least within the States shall be settled in that manner. I deplore this condition, and we are not helping it any by giving such serious consideration to matters that are wholly local and which should be dealt with locally.

We have now on the statute books the antitrust law, for instance, under which wherever evidence of profiteering can be obtained there is a remedy provided. Why not apply it? Why not bring the evidence into court and convict the one who is guilty rather than run to the Congress of the United States for supplementary laws to meet conditions that are natural?

The price of wheat is fixed by the Government at $2.26 a bushel. That measures quite a difference from the prewar price; but the Government recognizes surely that that was a fair price to pay to encourage production.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am speaking in the time of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was addressing his remarks to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, what I have to say is less important than the present discussion, and I am very glad to yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, after the Senator from Nevada concludes the reading of the article I shall, notwithstanding the interesting nature of the discussion, insist upon the regular order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I merely desire to ask the Senator if he does not know that at the time the price of wheat was fixed by the Government at $2.20 a bushel it was selling on the open market at from $2.65 to $3 a bushel?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, granting that that was true, I take it that the Government was then predicating its price for the present and for the future crop.

Mr. CURTIS. And to-day on the lower grades of wheat they are paying in the markets of the West from 30 to 40 cents a bushel more than the Government price. The higher grades are selling at $3 a bushel in Minneapolis and St. Paul. The producers of wheat in Kansas and Missouri and Oklahoma and that section are complaining at the action of the United States Grain Corporation on cumulative and excessive discounts on lower grades of wheat and against the action of the corporation in refusing licenses to competitive exporters. The price fixed on the lower grades of wheat is below the market price.

Another thing I think the Senator should remember—that is, in handling the wheat last year the Grain Corporation made a profit of $23,000,000. Instead of this profit going to the farmer, it went to the Grain Corporation. The amount of profit is given in the report of the Grain Corporation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There is just one question I should like to ask of the Senators who represent the wheat-growing States and know the conditions in those States, and then I will yield the floor.

It is alleged in the market reports that wheat is now going above the Government price. Is that, in the Senator's opinion, brought about by manipulation of the market or is it in accord with the law of supply and demand upon the present basis of prices?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator is addressing that question to me, I should say that the price is based upon the law of supply and demand. Any man who has taken the time to study the situation knows that there is going to be a shortage of wheat. The Senator knows that when this price was fixed it was fixed for the purpose of stimulating production. That is what Mr. Hoover told the committee. I believe that every member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will agree with me that we fixed the price of $2.26 as a minimum price. During most of the time or during all of the time that Mr. Hoover had control he used it as a maximum price. Now, Mr. Barnes has made an effort to use the minimum price as a maximum price, but he has been unable to do so, because most people believe that the war is over.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, at some other time than now I shall have something more to say on this subject. What I do want to state is that the interference here in Congress, or the threat or the probability of our passing these sumptuary laws, is already demoralizing the industrial world to such an extent that people do not know what to engage in for fear that some law may be passed that will either restrict or in some way embarrass the business in which they would like to engage. The sooner we can assure the public that in their business affairs they will be allowed to conduct business along the natural lines of the law of supply and demand, when they can go out and buy and sell justly and honestly without governmental interference, the better for all concerned.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senator to yield simply because the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] says there will be no chance to follow up this discussion after the Senator from Nevada got through; and therefore I am going to ask the Senator a real pertinent question bearing upon this subject at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I would not insist upon the regular order against my friend the Senator from North Dakota under any circumstances.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator.

I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that upon looking at the last report of the wholesale price of flour in Boston I find that winter wheat ranges from $11.25 to $12 and above that per barrel, and spring wheat from $12 to $12.50 per barrel. I also ascertain that it is retailing for about $14 per barrel. Now, a barrel of flour is consumed by one individual in one year. Therefore, the awful expense that the American people pay per capita for their flour at present at retail is about $14 annually. That $14, divided by 12, will give you a little over a dollar in a month, or 3½ cents per day. That is what it is costing the American people for their flour—about 3½ cents per day each.

I want to ask the Senator if he knows of anything on earth that the American people are buying to-day, measured by its intrinsic value, that is as cheap as flour. If that is the cheapest thing on earth to-day, then I want to know why all this noise about flour, and nothing said about the cost of your clothing, which has gone up double what the price of flour has; the cost of medicine, which has gone up three times as much as the cost of your flour; the other bills that you pay, which, on the average, range three or four times as much as your flour? Why all this silence about all of these other subjects and all this attack upon the cheapest thing that you buy? Compare your flour bill of 3½ cents per day, if you will, with your cigar bill. If people are getting to a condition where one-third of them, or one-half of them, to-day can remain idle on account of the excessive wages, and they are going really hungry, I think they might even cut out the cigar, if it became absolutely necessary, because they pay five times as much to-day for their cigars as they do for their flour. It seems to me unjust, and I appeal to the Senator that he ought not to attack the farmer, who gets the least out of this, and blame him for the high cost of living upon a product in which there is less raise between the original price and the consumer's price than any other article that you buy in the market.

My colleague [Mr. GRONNA] has already stated something about the condition of the wheat crop; and while we are going to ask in a short time for the passage of a bill to raise the salaries of all the employees on our railways—another Adamson bill, in order to get a certain vote—I have a little telegram that I received last night from a farmer in my State, which gives the condition out there and also suggests a remedy. I ask that it be read, as it is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

JAMESTOWN, N. DAK., August 3, 1919.

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Farmers 16 hours per day, Sunday included, fighting black rust, drought, hoppers, and wilt. Labor unions, 6 and 8 hours day, expect farmers to feed them for nothing. What we need is a little backbone and a good club to make these fellows line up where they belong.

PIERCE BLEWITT.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada did not rise for the purpose of attacking the farmers, and he has not attacked the farmers. The article which I had started to read was an attack upon the administration and indirectly an attack upon the farmers. I read it, however, because of the statement made by the Senator from North Dakota that to-morrow the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is going to take up the consideration of this very important question.

This article is an editorial from the New York Sun. That is a paper that has considerable dignity and is sometimes correct. If the Senator from North Dakota will listen to this article, he will find that it differs with him in regard to the effect of raising the price of wheat.

When the Washington administration nailed up the price of wheat at such an abnormal level it automatically elevated the prices of corn and other grains. And when the Washington administration did that thing it doubled and trebled general food costs, for virtually all the food that man, woman, or child eats is nothing but grain. The man eating beef at his dinner table eats condensed grain; the baby at its bottle in the crib eats condensed grain; the steer that gives the beef, the cow that gives the milk, the hen that lays the egg are alike fed and fattened on grain.

When the Washington administration nailed up the price of wheat it screwed up the price of labor, for labor had to have more and more wages to pay the grossly excessive food prices which were made by the Washington administration when it made the grain prices. And when the Washington administration screwed up the price of labor it screwed up the cost of every single thing that is made by labor.

The Washington administration need not search the country over, it need not search one foot beyond its own doorstep, for the cause of the fearful cost of living which, from having become a discomfort, now grows to be a menace to the country.

Until the Washington administration knocks from under the wheat market the props which the Washington administration itself has set up and still holds in place, or until somebody knocks them out, the cost of living in this country will not come down and can not come down. Unless the Washington administration or somebody knocks out those props from under the wheat market the cost of food, the cost of all living, will go still higher. Then the job will be done by political dynamite.

Let me say that this question is worthy of consideration by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and it will have to be considered by the Senate. Whether or not the Government will have to act on the matter I do not know; but I do know, with every Senator here, that the situation is serious—extremely serious. And let me say that I did not vote with the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Minnesota on fixing the price of wheat. I thought it was too high. The administration thought the price of wheat was too high. The administration—if they are referring to a Democratic administration and not simply referring to the whole Congress—did not favor this legislation.

When the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] came before the Senate on the Agricultural bill to fix the price of wheat at $2.50 there were 29 Republicans in this body who voted for it and 17 Democrats who voted for it. There were 16 Democrats who voted against it and 2 Republicans who voted against it. No matter whether the Sun be right or wrong with regard to the effect of fixing the price of wheat as it was fixed, the fact remains that its partisan charge that this is due to the administration certainly will not be sustained by any Senator on the floor. I do not believe it was a partisan question at the time it was before this body. There was not any partisan color given to it. As a matter of fact, when the House and the Senate in conference agreed on $2.40 a bushel the President of the United States vetoed the whole Agricultural appropriation bill because he said that $2.40 was unconscionably high. Then, of course, when it came back to Congress they put it at $2.26.

I am very glad to have the Senator from Minnesota and the two Senators from North Dakota state that the article is wrong in saying that the price was too high. I am very glad to have the Senator from Minnesota tell us also that while Mr. Hoover had an embargo controlling the mills of the country prices were controlled in the matter. I do not know but what they are higher since Mr. Hoover's hands have been taken off, as the Senator from Minnesota says.

The fact remains that something has to be done. The Senator from South Carolina is opposed to the Government interfering in any way at all. I think we are all opposed to the Government interfering, but we are a great deal more opposed to the conditions that now exist than we are to interference by the Government with the individual, or in any direction. Great bodies of organized laboring men in the country are demanding a raise in wages—which is not the first raise they have demanded—and they base it upon the ground that every time they have had a raise in wages the cost of living has moved up with it, and then when the cost of living gets up it is the foundation for another raise in wages. It is an endless cycle that has to be stopped either by the Government or by some character of force, which none of us want.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that I am glad to hear that remark; but I would like to have him tell us when and how we are going to stop it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was only called to make the remark by the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture announced to us that they were going to take up the consideration of the high cost of living. I certainly hope they will.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would it not be a good idea that the Members of the Senate should take a stand that we will fix no more legislative wages for anyone or fix any more prices?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know about that. If the price of food gets up so high that a man can not live when he is working for a Government institution the Government either has to put down the cost of living or put up the means of paying for it.

Mr. McCUMBER. How about when clothing gets so high that he can not clothe himself?

Mr. PITTMAN. I was not making any particular attack on wheat. I had in mind clothing, food, shoes, rents, and everything else, just the same.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator recognizes that every time we raise the price of labor, whether it is done legislatively or otherwise, it necessarily raises the price of everything labor produces, and that necessarily increases the cost of living, and that necessarily demands another raise to meet it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I admit it is an endless cycle, apparently.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I want to ask the Senator a question. Does not the Senator realize that the high cost of living is not a national but a world condition?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think that is true.

Mr. THOMAS. Can the Senator suggest any way by which one nation—and I care not how large that nation is—can effectually deal with a world-wide situation by legislation?

Mr. PITTMAN. I would a great deal rather trust the Senator's own opinion than my own in regard to a matter of such vast importance.

Mr. THOMAS. My own opinion is that it can not be done.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was simply stating a fact, called forth solely by reason of the fact that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] stated that he was going to call a meeting of his committee to consider the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before the matter is closed I wish to refer to a statement by the Senator from Nevada that this has to stop some place. I infer it is the general regulation of prices by central authority. That has been tried historically. It was tried at Rome, and the Provinces ceased to produce and the country starved to death. I do not want to go into that particularly.

It is stated that one of the principal food products has been very high priced during this period of regulation. I have the earnings of the packers, large and small, in the United States on their property investments since last year. Although they could have earned under the war regulations not exceeding 9 per cent on that investment, last year they earned 5.6 per cent on their property investment. That is the lowest earning of any large industry dealing in any of the essential food products, not only in this country but in the world. They earned on the total volume of business transacted in packing-house products in the United States, on each dollar of volume of business, 1.6 per cent. Those are the figures tabulated and the percentages calculated on the total volume of business and on the property investment.

The high cost of living that is on everyone's tongue and affecting everyone's pocketbook does not begin with the profits made by something more than 200 packers in the United States, including both large and small. These figures I have given, applied to the five large packers, prove true in their volume of business and in their property investment. Therefore, Mr. President, if there is an increase in the price of meat, that spread in the price must come after it leaves the refrigerator car of the packer.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senate will bear with me for a few minutes, I desire to refer to the question brought before the Senate by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the high cost of living, and I will say that I will be brief in what I have to say.

Mr. President, I do not think the American Congress need lose its head upon this question. We all recognize that the high cost of living is with us, and we all want to know the reason why it is here, whether it is particularly applicable to the United States or whether it is a world question.

I now call the attention of the Senate to some facts existing in the world that have a bearing upon this question. When any committee begins to consider the question of the reducing of the high cost of living, it has to take into consideration the conditions that exist in the world to-day; and no one would like to see the conditions changed better than I, for I look forward to trouble in different countries unless the change comes within a reasonable time.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator calls attention to the fact that we are likely to have trouble. I had a letter read here the other day from a very able lawyer suggesting the same thing, and just because he was of a progressive mind it was denominated Bolshevism. Is the Senator from Utah afraid——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not discussing that question at this time. I am discussing the subject of conditions affecting the high cost of living.

Mr. GRONNA. I know that, but——

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that I do not remember what was in that letter.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will pardon me, I simply wanted to get his views on it. I will state that there was nothing in the letter which contained Bolshevism, but it was so denominated by somebody here. The Senator has been more firmly stating the proposition here to-day than was stated in the letter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to proceed now with what I had in my mind to say.

If we seek for the causes that brought about the present exorbitant prices and undertake to legislate to regulate them, we will find that we have more of a job on our hands than we anticipate. Does the Senate realize that the obligations of the Governments of the world since the beginning of the year 1914 have increased from $40,000,000,000 to $220,000,000,000? Does the Senate realize that paper currency issued to-day by the Governments of the world amounts to $36,000,000,000 as against $8,000,000,000 on the 1st day of January, 1914? Have you thought that the bank deposits in our own country have increased from $25,000,000,000 to $75,000,000,000, due in part to inflation of currency and the high prices obtaining?

All these things, Mr. President, have a bearing on the high cost of living, and what we want to do above all else, not only in this country but in the world, is to begin to bring about a deflation of paper money and bring back normal conditions as nearly as possible—and in passing I wish to say that we never will be back to past normal conditions—and when that time comes there will be a decrease in the high cost of living.

I recognize the wisdom in the words of the Senator from South Carolina, in his statement that the question of the high cost of living was not so pressing as the cost of high living. But as long as the present conditions exist in our country, as well as in other countries, we may not look for normal conditions to return.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Utah think that one of the greatest things we need is for people to go to work, to get back on the farm and raise something to eat, to stop clamoring for shorter hours, but to create something to live on? To employ fewer people and encourage others to till the soil and become producers?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course that would mean the greater production of goods, and that in itself would result in reducing the high cost of living, but I am discussing now at this time the inflation of the currency.

Take the thirty-six billion of paper money that has been issued by the Governments of the world to-day. That is more than the value of all the gold and the silver produced in the world for the last 400 years. Our paper currency is supposed to be based upon gold and silver, gold only in this country and gold only in most all the other countries, and yet the production for over 400 years of gold and silver is not equal to the amount of paper money that is circulated by the Governments of the world to-day.

The interest charges on the debts of all the Governments of the world, Mr. President, before the war amounted to about $2,000,000,000. Now they will amount to over $10,000,000,000. The appropriations asked for by England for the coming year are six times the amount that they were before the war, and the appropriations in France, Italy, and the United States will be over four times the amount. As long as these conditions exist I want to say to the Senate that there will be high prices in all parts of the world.

The high prices have not only prevailed in the United States but in all civilized countries of the world. Take China. Silk advanced from $3 to $6 per pound. Manila hemp from $180 to $437 per ton. Wood pulp from $14 to $35 per ton. Sisal grass from $100 a ton to $400. Egyptian cotton from 14 cents to 35 cents per pound. I could go on and enumerate nearly every known article, Mr. President, produced in every part of the world. The cost has advanced nearly equal to the cost of the goods that are produced in this country.

I believe the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] was right when he stated that there was a great hullabaloo over the question of the price of flour and never mentioning others that have advanced to far greater extent.

This morning I received my monthly statement from my grocer and I have it before me. If any committee of Congress want to find out where to begin cutting down the high cost of living in the District of Columbia, I feel they had better begin with the retailer first. The whole system of distribution in this country is wrong. It is too cumbersome and costly. Some time or other the people are going to insist that a great change be made.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Does not the Senator think that this should be done by the people in the locality in which the grocers are situated rather than by the Federal Government undertaking to regulate the retail business throughout the entire country?

Mr. SMOOT. As long as the retailers will agree upon the prices at which they sell goods, I doubt very much whether the prices can be regulated entirely by local laws, but that is where regulation should be begun.

For instance, I find apples are sold at $4 a bushel, watermelons $1.25 apiece. I heard the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] say but last Saturday that he would guarantee to deliver to merchants or purchasers in the District of Columbia watermelons, weighing from 35 to 45 pounds, at 60 cents apiece. Yet I find that when I buy a moderate sized watermelon for my family I pay from $1 to $1.25 for it. Peaches are $1 for a little box. Cucumbers are 15 cents apiece. Do you know what that is a ton? Impossible for me to say. Onions are 12½ cents a pound. A chicken no larger than my hand costs $1.50. Common cheese, or skimmed milk cheese, is 48 cents a pound. Twelve pounds of flour cost $1.05. That is nearly $18 a barrel, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me add, Mr. President, that when we buy a tomato now we pay 10 cents for it. We used to sell them for 30 cents a bushel. Figuring 200 in a bushel Senators can see about what it would cost—10 times 200.

Mr. SMOOT. Twenty dollars a bushel.

Mr. President, I say now that you can take the monthly bill of individual purchasers from, I will not say every store in Washington, because I do not know them all, but I believe from any store in the District of Columbia, and if the committee will ascertain what the profits are upon the overturn or the difference between what the retailer paid for the goods and what he sells them for to his customers, I have no doubt but what the average in the overturn will be over 40 per cent. I know that is a low estimate; but I will say the average will be over 40 per cent. If this thing can be reached some way, then the high cost of living will be reduced to a certain extent.

It is not only the retailer, Mr. President. The wholesaler makes a profit; I can not say how much, but I am quite sure he is not contented with any less than 20 per cent. It is not the farmer who gets the extra money. He certainly gets no more than it has cost him to produce the articles in comparison with what he could produce for before the war. But I say the greater part is an unwise method of distributing the goods after they are produced in this country. That is where the great increase of cost of living lies. Goods are passed from the manufacturer to the jobber, and from the jobber to the wholesaler, and from the wholesaler to the retailer, and from the retailer to the consumer, and sometimes there are a number of selling agencies or commission men also handling the goods, every one of them charging a certain per cent, and the final consumer paying the accumulated charges, ranging all the way from 10 per cent profit in some cases up to 40 or 50 and sometimes 100 per cent in other cases.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I judge the Senator means to contend that there is a certain amount of profiteering going on?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me one thing we ought to do is to locate the profiteers and go for the profiteers.

Mr. SMOOT. We know where they are located. We can locate them in the District of Columbia and in every other city in the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then I wish to inquire whether the Senator has thought of the idea that perhaps there is a disposition to pass on to the consumer all the taxes that the people are obliged to pay; for instance, excess-profits taxes and that sort of thing, and whether that really does not have some effect on the high cost of living.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. All that passes on to the consumer.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not say all does, but all that can be.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not mean that it all does, but so far as they can do it. That helps to increase the cost of living. We ought to find some way to prevent that, if possible.

I agree with the Senator in his position with regard to our complex and inadequate and wasteful system of distribution. In 1916 I made a strong effort to see if we could not promote direct dealing between the producers of farm products and the consumers. I was denounced everywhere by the middlemen, the grocery men, the commission people, and so on, as playing into the hands of the mail-order houses, such as the Sears, Roebuck & Co. and others. But there is no doubt about the feasibility of that plan. There, I think, lies a splendid field for investigation, and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I hope, will press it further.

I was able to get a provision in the Post Office appropriation bill in 1916 for $10,000 for the purpose of experimenting by that department on the plan of promoting direct dealing between the producers of farm products and the consumers through an extension of the Parcel Post System. The war came on, and I think nothing was done about it, but something of that sort, I believe, would meet the Senator's criticism of our wasteful system of distribution.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me say to the Senator from Florida in this connection that if we did not have the telephone, which I think costs the American people more than any other modern necessity, the situation would not be so bad. The housewife, and if it is not the housewife, the maid or the cook or somebody else, telephones to the store a dozen times during the day for different articles, requesting that they be delivered immediately, and, of course, all that costs money.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SMOOT. And the consumer pays for it. The man who packs his goods home or purchases in large quantities, or at least buys all he wants for a day or two at once, is charged up with a portion of that abnormal delivery expense.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] suggests that we ought to hunt out the profiteer and go after the profiteer. We know where the profiteer is; we do not have to hunt him; but he is just as safe and will be for the next four years as he has been for the last four years.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me that one great duty the Senate has to perform is to refrain from adding fuel to the fire and turning it into a great conflagration. If the Senate of the United States loses its head, it will have a bad effect on the country. If we undertake to follow the methods of the agitator and grow excited, we are liable to make conditions a great deal worse than they now are.

There is one lesson we ought to be able to get out of the present situation. It is that the American people and the American Government have nearly all they can attend to at home without spreading themselves out over the world and trying to take care of all the good Lord's creation. We have problems here that will tax the best energies of our statesmen and the best thought of our economists for a number of years to come. I am of the opinion that it would be better that we should look after great problems that concern the bread and the butter, the fuel and the housing of our own country, than to be undertaking to look after the spiritual and physical and financial welfare of the gentlemen from Timbuctoo and other remote parts of the world.

One thing is unquestionably true. If we can not feed ourselves, we ought not to be undertaking to feed the world. If we can not keep prices here within the limits of our people's purchasing ability, we ought not to be spending our money and giving our goods to people who are 10,000 miles from our shores and who brought their misfortunes upon their own heads.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator if he has any information with reference to the amount of foodstuffs we have sent to Europe since the armistice was declared?

Mr. REED. I have not. I have been trying to get some information together, and I expect to submit it at a later date. But this question is before the Senate, and I want to offer a few general observations this morning.

One thing I do know, and that is that we appropriated $100,000,000 to send over to Europe and did it without batting an eye. We handled it as though it were 100,000,000 leaves from the trees and we owned the forests of the world. We sent it over to feed other people; not exactly that, but we appropriated it for the purpose of taking American foodstuffs out of American markets by the hand of the Government and transporting them to foreign lands to be fed into the mouths of other people. That one item by itself would not have affected in any great degree the question of prices, but it was an item of the cumulative processes that have been going on for many months.

I beg of the Senate to keep its head, to keep its judgment, to look at this situation on broad lines, and if it does I have no hesitancy in saying that the real solution of this question in the end must be an increase of production.

Mr. KING rose.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Utah desire to ask me a question?

Mr. KING. I did not desire to ask a question, but I thought perhaps I might in part answer the question of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. Our exports during June were $900,000,000, the greatest that they have ever been in the history of the United States, and the greater part of that amount consisted of food products. The preceding month, as I recall, the exports were $700,000,000; the month preceding that something like $600,000,000. During each of those months, and indeed during every month since the armistice, the greater proportion of exports consisted of food products.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me an observation, I will say I did not mean the amount of foodstuffs that had been imported by Europe in legitimate commercial operations. I had in mind the amount of foodstuffs that we, as a Government, had sent to relieve distress in Europe and distributed as a gift.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, those detailed figures will all be important.

Now let me present, if I may have the attention of the Senate, in just a few sentences a concrete situation. Everyone knows that if there were an enormous surplus of tomatoes the price which the Senator from Utah states is being charged of 10 cents apiece would be impossible, for somebody being unable to sell his tomatoes for 10 cents apiece, because the market was supplied, would begin to cut the price. What is true of tomatoes is true of everything else; but if instead of raising more tomatoes than this market can absorb we proceed by governmental action to take out of the market a part of the tomatoes that are now here and send them five or six thousand miles away, and use the money of the people of the United States to transact that business, the result inevitably will be that the price will mount. I have chosen a very poor illustration; it would have been better had I taken beef or flour or some of the great staples; but let the tomato stand as an illustration.

What are we doing? What is proposed to be done? It was read into the RECORD the other day—and I reserve the right, Mr. President, to insert it as a part of my remarks—that there is a plan on foot by which great corporations are to be organized which are to undertake to finance Europe, to rehabilitate Europe, and to feed Europe. Those great corporations are to furnish the money to Europe with which to buy American products, in order, as it is said, to make a market for America's goods, wares, and merchandise, including farm products. The money is to be loaned to Europe upon the securities of European Governments; and our Government, through the league of nations, is to underwrite those obligations by guaranteeing the stability of the European Governments.

We are told by Mr. Davidson, in his testimony, that this project has been submitted to the Treasury of the United States, and that the Treasury of the United States proposes to cooperate; that the bankers of our country have been called together in New York and in Chicago for the purpose of creating this great trust that will gather into its enormous sweep the money of the country with which to finance Europe, then the products of our country to supply Europe; and the Treasury of the United States is to be called upon to cooperate and to underwrite.

Mr. Henry P. Davidson, partner in the J. P. Morgan & Co. firm, of New York City, and one of the financial advisers to our President in France, in speaking to the bankers of Chicago in June, 1919, stated:

> You've helped to pay for the war. You've helped to loan $10,000,000,000 to Europe, which she can not pay at present. But you are not through yet. You must help pay for Europe's reconstruction, and the first little bill for your remittance is $3,000,000,000.
>
> Europe is groggy from the effects of the war. She is debt ridden. She is hungry. She needs copper and cotton and machinery and everything else. Her factories are idle. You and all the rest of us Americans have to help her get back to where she was before the war.
> We must find out what she needs in reason, and distribute our goods accordingly. My suggestion is to coordinate all our industries and have the whole directed by one central organization, supported and assisted by the Federal Government. Thus the chaos that would result from individual endeavors will be avoided.
> My suggestion is that debentures might be issued against the credits established in Europe, secured by everything given against the shipment. Every country would guarantee debentures against it. The debentures would really be against the whole of Europe. The banking interests could place these debentures with the public, distributed as widely as possible. Complete agreement should exist with the administration and with the Treasury Department.

Mr. President, that process is proposed to be carried on. We are to drain this country of its money; we are to drain this country of its goods at the very time when our people are clamoring to Congress and to other legislative bodies and to men everywhere to grant some relief to them at home.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not think the Senator from Missouri means by the position which he has assumed to regard it as an evil for this country to dispose of its surplus products to Europe?

Mr. REED. No; not of its surplus.

Mr. KING. Let me illustrate: Last week representatives were here from one of the Dakotas—I am not sure whether from North or South Dakota—for the purpose of trying to get some one to aid in financing them to dispose of four or five hundred thousand head of horses that were required in Poland and Roumania; but because there was no international bank or no means of exchange, or because those Governments could not purchase American exchange, the transaction, as I am advised, fell through. The Senator from Missouri unquestionably would be glad to have some sort of instrumentality perfected by which exchanges of our surplus products might be effectuated and the people of Europe who need them might secure them?

Mr. REED. Ah, Mr. President, that is one way to put it. Of course, everyone wants this country to be in a position to sell its real surplus abroad and obtain good prices for it; but there is a vast difference between our selling our real surplus abroad upon the markets over there and organizing a scheme that will drain the financial veins of this country for the benefit of Europe and to the detriment of this country, then drain from this country through that means not the surplus of our products but the things our own people need and to employ the resources of America to make a competitive market in Europe, constantly mounting higher, to compete with our own people. To do that and at the same moment to stand here and complain about high prices in the United States is the sum total of idiocy.

We might as well understand in this world that we can not eat our cake and have our cake. What I have said I mention merely in passing. We talk about profiteers, and yet here is a plan to organize a gigantic concern that will control the foreign markets of America, and if they control the foreign markets they will control the prices of the produeer. They have already, as an illustration, told in their testimony how they expect to be the sole market for cotton. The sole market for cotton abroad will fix the price of cotton here, and the gentleman who controls that market abroad will reap the profits, instead of the producer of the cotton reaping the profits. It is impossible to take the money of America and constantly send it abroad without producing in this country a demand for money and making money harder to get, and it is impossible to take the goods of America and send them abroad without making a scarcity here.

If there is not organized a corporation, if we do not do these things, and the Government does not interfere, the law of supply and demand will operate hard enough on our people, because there is an enormous demand over there; but if the Government gets into it and the great financiers of Wall Street—and I dislike to use that term; it is much abused—get into it and the money of our country is taken and loaned to those people, it will create an artificial governmental suction and pull away from our people the things they must have. We can not escape that conclusion; there is not any use trying to escape it.

What is the real problem? I grant you that in the case of every great effect there are always numerous causes; but if we look at the real question as it is, it seems to me there are some fundamental considerations that every student of economics must agree upon. The first proposition is that in normal times consumption and production run an equal race. If production exceeds consumption by but 5 per cent a month, there will be a surplus of 60 per cent at the end of the year; and a surplus of that kind accumulated will destroy any market and break down any kind of productive activity, because the surplus will be a constant menace to prices and will force restrictions. On the other hand, if there be a deficiency in production of but 5 per cent a month, the accumulation of that throughout the year will make such a demand that at the end of 12 months or 24 months the people will be clamoring for this thing which is to them a necessity, and prices will mount, and sometimes they will mount inordinately, so that the speculator, the profiteer, at such a time as that immediately begins his activities and finds a field for a golden harvest.

Now, what has been going on in the world? Over five years ago there were suddenly drawn out of the productive agencies of the world approximately 20,000,000 men. Those 20,000,000 men, instead of being producers, became consumers alone. Back of the 20,000,000 men who were upon the field of battle was a vast army of men, women, and children who turned the major portion of their energies not to the production of the commodities the population required to live upon, but they turned their energies to the production of instrumentalities of destruction which were of no economic value, to begin with, and which, as soon as they were employed, were destroyed in the very act of employment and had to be reproduced. This was the situation in Europe. Our own country, happily out of the war for almost three years, did what? We began to ship abroad, in order to meet the demand there, not only the ordinary surplus we had but everything that could be spared, and mounting prices day after day drew more and more from our country.

But we did another thing: We ceased to make the useful instruments that have the power of reproduction and began to make things to be sent to Europe that would not even reproduce themselves there. To illustrate: When a plow is made and turned over to a farmer, the labor which has been put into that plow is not wasted; the plow reproduces itself many times over as it turns the sod and makes it possible to raise crops.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to multiply that illustration; but every man here in his own mind can multiply it a million times, as rapidly as his thoughts can work.

So that we pulled out of the productive activities of this country a vast arm of men who began to make stuff to be sent abroad which when it was over there did not even benefit Europe in the sense of giving it something to work with, but for the most part it was used upon the field of battle. That was true even of our automobiles and our trucks, which ordinarily would have a productive capacity. They were employed in this business that makes money for nobody.

So, Mr. President, the situation ran, and the exports of this country to Europe of steel and iron and wood and wheat and copper and all the great raw materials went on to an extent never before indulged; and as those things went abroad this country was deprived of the natural surplus that otherwise would have existed here—a surplus sufficient always to maintain us. We were not satisfied with sending our real surplus abroad; we deprived ourselves and our people of much that was needed here, and so prices mounted. They inevitably would mount.

Then we got into the war, and, first and last, we withdrew directly from the industrial activities of this Nation approximately 5,000,000 men for the Army and the Navy; I think in excess of that number. If you were at any normal time to withdraw from productive activity in this country 5,000,000 laborers in a few month's time there would be a gap between production and consumption, and that gap would be bridged by high prices. That is the inevitable result, shown by all history.

Very well. We not only withdrew these men from the activities, but we began to expend upon them and were compelled to do so—and, of course, I am not complaining about it—many millions of dollars, many billions of dollars, and to absorb in their mobilization, in their distribution, and in their training the energies of a vast multitude of people who were not on the field of battle or in the camps.

For instance, the automobile, much sneered at, is nevertheless a great labor saver, and particularly the automobile truck is a great aid to production. Nearly every first-class automobile factory in the United States was closed down for months, or substantially closed down, and was turned into a place for the manufacture of Liberty engines, or parts of airplanes, or for the making of shells, or some of the impedimenta of war.

Of course, a shortage in automobiles was inevitable. Men were put into the steel mills, and instead of making steel which would be sent out to build houses for people and factories that would have machinery in which there would be further production they were put to the business of making steel which went across the ocean. We drew on every energy of our people and we quit producing the things that the people must have just in proportion as we took those energies and put them into other fields of activity.

The result of the matter is that we have come to pay day. We have come to a time when we must face the problem of how we are going to keep our people in a position so that they can live, and at the same time hold the situation steady until production shall catch up with consumption. So the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] put much wisdom in the remark that the thing to do was to get the people back to work.

We ought not only to get the people back to work, into the fields of production, but we ought to cut off every interference with the full and free flow of honest trade and of honest business. I do not mean by that to exculpate the gentleman who tries to create a monopoly, or who seeks to forestall the market, or to profiteer. He has always been a criminal under the common law, and he is a criminal now under the common law, and also under the statutes of the United States; and in so far as that can be found and proven, the guilty party ought to be punished. But nothing that we can do will be more disastrous than to take action here which will alarm the great productive world, and will convince the man who is about to build a house and employ a lot of labor that it is unsafe for him to enter upon that enterprise; to take action that will convince the man who is about to undertake the manufacturing of a large amount of the necessaries of life that it is unsafe for him to make his venture, lest he be interfered with. It is time for the employment of sober thought and of common sense, and it is time to recognize the fact that the cost of this war is not settled when we have issued our bonds. It is not settled even when we have gotten our boys home. The cost of this war will rest upon our people as a heavy burden for many years to come. We have gone in debt; we have wasted our resources; and when I say that I do not mean that we have improvidently thrown them away, but I do mean to say that we were compelled to waste them. While that has been going on for a long time, while the money was being borrowed from the people, we did not so much notice it, but meanwhile the prices have mounted and mounted and mounted, and now we have reached a condition where one raise means another raise. If I were going to suggest a broad and general remedy it would be this: For people to quit eternally demanding and to have a little of that spirit of sacrifice at home which we are talking about exercising abroad.

I heard a conversation recently between two railroad men in a Southern State. It was nearly 1 o'clock in the morning, when I was waiting for a train at a junction point, and two very well-dressed gentlemen were standing there discussing the situation. I soon learned that one of them was a shop man and the other was engaged in the operation of the trains. One of them said to the other, "Well, the big men have had their meeting." The second man said, "What did they do?" "Oh," said the first, "we have asked for the railroads this time." The other one said, "Well, I guess we are just about entitled to them." The first man replied, "Well, I doubt the wisdom of it. If this goes into effect my wages will be advanced $80 a month, and I am already getting over $200 a month, and there has got to be some end to this." But the other gentleman immediately began to tell him about the high cost of living, about the enormous costs that everybody had to bear, and in a little while he succeeded in convincing the first man that probably they were entitled to this raise. I hope that spirit is not prevalent everywhere; but there has been too much of this spirit of people demanding, and still demanding.

When you come to governmental regulation, its futility is well illustrated in the city of Washington. I believe there is this spirit of profiteering that the Senator from Utah spoke of, but it is a strange thing that we find it here in Washington among the retailers and wholesalers of groceries and farm products. The fact that we do find it here is the highest evidence that whenever the Government undertakes to regulate the business of the people it ends in an inglorious failure.

Go down here on Pennsylvania Avenue and you will find some of the most magnificent public markets in the world. Then you will find in other parts of the city of Washington great buildings devoted to the business of public marketing. The Government, as I understand, is in complete control of those markets. They were established for the benefit of the people. One thing I am sure of is that when a market is established as a public market it is subject to governmental control. Now, I have been told—in fact, I know it to be the truth—that the prices down in these public markets are substantially the same prices which you have to pay in the corner grocery, if you allow the corner grocer a differential which represents the extra accommodation he gives to his customer, for he is near his customer and he delivers the goods, and, generally speaking, the market does not. With these markets here, that were supposed to be established for the benefit of the people many years ago, we nevertheless find the same system of high prices prevailing that apparently prevails elsewhere in the city. It is a pretty apt illustration of the fact that when the Government undertakes to run all the business of a country it only muddles the business of a country.

The truth about the matter is that we speak of the Government in the abstract, as though it were some great embodiment of wisdom that acted automatically and with absolute accuracy, producing the best possible results; but translate the Government into actuality, and you find it is a man who is undertaking to manage a particular part of the governmental function, and that man is generally a man who has been utterly incompetent to make his living in the competitive life of the world, and he has found a Government job, and his head is full of theories, and what is not filled up with theories is nine times out of ten filled up with nonsense.

That is pretty harsh talk, and I do not want to speak harshly of any of these people. But when a man undertakes to sit in the city of Washington and tell the planter in Mississippi or Georgia what he ought to do, it is conclusive evidence that he does not know what to do, for if he really knew the problem, he would know that the man who was in contact with it could handle it better than he could. I do not mean that there can not be suggestions made of an expert character, but I am speaking about interfering with business people.

Mr. President, I believe that every time the Government has interfered in the business of this country, from the time the war began down to the present hour, it has had the effect of putting up prices instead of putting them down. And it is not hard to understand the rise in prices if you take concrete cases and follow them out.

There was testimony given before some of the coal investigating committees as to the rise in the price of coal, and I do not know anything outside of that business that better illustrates the two propositions I am discussing, namely, that supply and demand is the one great controlling feature; and, secondly, that governmental interference is likely to produce disastrous consequences.

In the first place, when the war in Europe broke out there were enormous demands made upon our manufacturers, as a result of which they wanted coal, and the evidence shows that they went down to the coal miner or to the great wholesale coal dealer and proposed to put in their orders for coal. They came in such numbers that he became alarmed and began to question whether he could supply them, and they began actually to bid against each other, saying, "Name your price," and he, being an ordinary individual, wanting to make money, named a very high price. Then, for a little while we had the same kind of a panic, in principle, in this country over coal that you have when people start a run on a bank. People start a run on a bank because they believe there is not money enough there to pay out, and they started bidding against each other for coal because they believed there was going to be a coal shortage. The result is that the prices went to a ridiculous figure.

About that time the Government stepped in and tried to make some regulation. I am not going to discuss that phase of it. Let that rest for some other occasion. But this is what took place. About that time the Government began its great agencies for the construction of ships, and it is in the testimony that the Government agents came to the coal mines and bid for the coal miner, offered him higher wages, and so the coal operator bid against the Government and the Government bid against the coal operator. There is plenty of evidence that the Government, engaged in manufacturing big implements of war, either directly or through its contractors, very frequently had one factory chief bidding against another factory chief for labor, and each of them was working for the Government.

Only a few days ago I was talking to an officer of the Navy, who stated to me that he had the literature that was handed to the men of the Navy soliciting them to quit the Navy and go to work for the Shipping Board, stating to them, "You draw a certain amount of wages"—and the amount was stated correctly—"but the Shipping Board will pay you so much more," giving a very large advance. So he said, "You find one department of the Government bidding against another department of the Government. So we are finding it difficult to keep men to do the work that is necessary to be done in the Navy." Those things have been going on, and they have been unwise, and ought not to be continued.

I repeat, in conclusion, that the thing to do is to get every soldier back from Europe as soon as he can be brought here, with due regard for our honorable obligations over there; demobilize our men as rapidly as possible, and let them get into the industries and begin becoming producers instead of consumers. And we should get rid of every surplus employee in Washington. The war has been over eight months, and yet I believe that a census taken in Washington to-day of Government employees will show that, while certain of the departments have been practically closed down, others have so enormously increased that there is still no very great reduction. Cut down these expenses, cut down these taxes, and if there is any way by which we can reach the criminal who has been speculating let us reach him. Outside of that, let business take its course. Let us try to get down to a point where we produce more than we need to consume, and when we have reached that point prices will drop, as they ought to drop.

Of course, the inflation of the currency has much to do with prices; but I do not care to discuss that question. I simply mention it lest it should be thought I had not taken it into consideration.

Above everything else, let the Senate of the United States not be guilty of going into a sort of granger legislation experimentation. Let us not make the mistakes that were made a good many years ago by a lot of misinformed but honest people out West, who thought they could change prices at will overnight. You can not do it.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McKELLAR presented a petition of sundry citizens of Frankewing, Tenn., praying for the repeal of the tax on ice cream, soda, soft drinks, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McKELLAR. I present a communication received from the national headquarters of the Private Soldiers and Sailors Legion of the United States of America, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 2, 1919.

At a meeting of the national executive committee of the Private Soldiers and Sailors Legion held at the headquarters of the legion last night, at 810 F Street NW., the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the national officers of the legion are hereby appointed and directed to act as a committee to confer with President Wilson and Grand Chief Warren E. Stone, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, for the purpose of supporting the urgent request of the brotherhood that President Wilson take immediate steps to curb the profiteers and reduce the present excessive prices for the necessaries of life; and

Resolved, That the national executive committee of the Private Soldiers and Sailors Legion, speaking what we know are the sentiments of 4,000,000 private soldiers and sailors and many more millions of their relatives and friends who are suffering most acutely under the heavy burden of the excessively high cost of the necessaries of life caused by the lawless operations of trusts and profiteers, feel that the President and Attorney General of the United States have ample power under the antitrust laws to give the people immediate relief, and to secure action, through the United States courts, by the appointment of Federal receivers (with power to reduce prices) for any of the law-breaking corporations who are cornering the markets and plundering the people; and

Resolved, That the national officers of the Private Soldiers and Sailors Legion are hereby authorized and directed to confer with Attorney General Palmer and other officials of the Government and the States, the railroad brotherhoods, and other labor, farmer, and reform organizations, to the end that the sentiment and opinion of all the masses of the people may be brought solidly behind the President and the Attorney General in the work of relieving the people from these unbearable extortionate high prices in the necessaries of life.

MARVIN GATES SPERRY,
President Private Soldiers and Sailors Legion.

Mr. LENROOT. I present a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution urging the Congress of the United States to enact legislation providing adequate compensation for soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the war against Germany, Austria, and their allies.

Whereas most of our soldiers, sailors, and marines in the war against Germany, Austria, and their allies sacrificed at a considerable financial loss established business connections and positions in agricultural, industrial, and other enterprises to serve their country; and

Whereas there is in this State and other States a desire and a strong purpose to fulfill the moral obligation, which they recognize, to compensate, in a measure at least, their soldiers, sailors, and marines because of loss so sustained and sacrifices so made; and

Whereas despite this strong desire and purpose this State and other States, because of constitutional inhibitions, have found it difficult, if not wholly impossible, to enact the necessary legislation to carry out their desires and purposes in this important matter: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature respectfully memoralize and urge the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation as may be necessary to adequately compensate soldiers, sailors, and marines for financial losses sustained and financial sacrifices made by them during the period of their valiant and heroic service to their country; be it further

Resolved, That a suitable copy of this resolution, properly attested, be transmitted to the President of the United States, the presiding officer of each House of the Congress, and to each United States Senator and Representative in Congress from this State.

RILEY S. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
EDWARD F. DITHMAR,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. I also present a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution urging Congress to pass the bill introduced by Hon. MARVIN JONES relating to recognition of the services of soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Whereas it is fitting and proper that the character and spirit of the patriotic services of the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the United States in the war against Germany and its allies be appropriately recognized and that their financial sacrifices be, in a measure at least, repaid; and

Whereas the men who made up the armed forces of the United States came from each State of the Union, therefore their services and sacrifices should be recognized and provided for by the Federal Government, to assure all a uniform and adequate compensation; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill introduced by the Hon. MARVIN JONES, which provides that each soldier, sailor, and marine shall receive a $50 4 per cent Government bond for each month's service or major fractional part thereof in such war; and

Whereas such provision should be a substantial recognition of such services and sacrifices and would be greater than this State or any other State contemplates as compensation therefor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be respectfully urged to enact such bill into law at the earliest possible time and that each United States Senator and Representative in Congress from this State be earnestly requested to use his best efforts to secure the early passage of such measure; and be it further

Resolved, That a suitable copy of this resolution, properly attested, be transmitted to the presiding officer of each House of the Congress and to each United States Senator and Representative from this State.

RILEY S. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
EDWARD F. DITHMAR,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of sundry parishioners of the parish of St. Isadore, county of Franklin, State of Vermont, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MOSES presented a resolution adopted at a union church meeting at Walpole, N. H., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Fenaya Tribe, No. 178, Improved Order of Red Men, of Madera, Calif., and a petition of Local Union No. 743, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Bakersfield, Calif., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of Local Union No. 910, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, of Arkansas City, Kans., praying for the ratification of the league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Hollis, Kans., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 1055, National Letter Carriers' Association, of Chanute, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented resolutions adopted by District No. 14, United Mine Workers of America, of Pittsburg, Kans., praying for the liberation of all political prisoners, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Kansas City, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Kendrick bills providing for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Newton, Kans., remonstrating against the adoption of universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Red Lodge, Mont., praying for the repeal of the so-called luxury tax, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a memorial of the ministers' conference, of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against the repeal of war-time prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a resolution adopted by the congregation of the Presbyterian Church of Edwardsburg, Mich., favoring the intervention of the United States in the atrocities perpetrated in Korea and other countries, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a petition of Waddell Post, 120, Grand Army of the Republic, of Howell, Mich., praying for an increase in the pensions of Civil War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a resolution adopted by the Republican Club of Detroit, Mich., favoring the withholding of victory buttons, etc., from conscientious objectors, slackers, and others, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a memorial of Slovenic National Benefit Society No. 323, of Ironwood, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation prohibiting the admission to the mails of any matter printed in a foreign language, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a petition of Local Branch No. 256, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Flint, Mich., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a memorial of the State Board of Examiners in Optometry of Michigan remonstrating against unjust discrimination by the United States Public Health Service relative to optometry, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a petition of the board of commerce of Detroit, Mich., praying for the reestablishment of all off-line offices, which were closed by order of the Director General of Railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented petitions of sundry citizens of Battle Creek, Iron Mountain, and Sagola, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the repeal of the tax on ice cream, soda, soft drinks, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2095) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint William Shelby Barriger captain of Cavalry, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 137) thereon.

Mr. FERNALD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 696) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Frank S. Bowker, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 138) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2257) for the relief of George B. Hughes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 139) thereon.

CHARLESTON (S. C.) IMMIGRATION STATION.

Mr. HARRIS. From the Committee on Immigration, I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 163) authorizing the Secretary of Labor to lease the Charleston immigration station and dock connected therewith, and I submit a report (No. 140) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Labor is authorized, in his discretion, to lease for other than governmental purposes the property known as the Charleston immigration station, with the improvements thereon; and said Secretary shall fix the amount of rental per annum to be paid therefor, which rental shall be a fair and just sum for property of like character, situation, and value, and prescribe such conditions regarding the uses to be made of said property as he shall deem proper: Provided, That all expenses of maintenance and repairs on the building and dock at said station shall be borne by the lessee or lessees: Provided further, That any lease executed under this resolution may be terminated and the property reoccupied under such conditions as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I introduce a bill which I desire to have referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. After it is read by its title I wish to make a very brief statement.

The bill (S. 2715) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This bill was transmitted to me by the Secretary of War together with a letter addressed to me; and I think it due to him and to the Senate to read one paragraph of the letter and then ask that the entire letter be printed together with the bill itself. In transmitting the bill the Secretary of War uses this language in his letter:

This is the latest form assumed by our studies on this subject in the War Department. We are still, however, unadvised by that intimate consultation of the experience and judgment of Gen. Pershing and his associates abroad, which would be necessary before a final draft could be said to represent the full opinion of the Army. I would not myself give official approval to a draft which did not contain the results of such a consultation. It is the purpose of your committee, however, to use this draft only as the basis of hearings at which Army officers will be in attendance, both those who have been familiar with the problems on this side and those who have had experience in the Expeditionary Forces.

May I say, Mr. President, that in introducing this bill I do not desire it to be understood that I am in any way committed to the support of any or all of its provisions. I introduce it in a ministerial capacity, as it were, in order that the present views of the War Department may be set before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs and the Congress and the country with respect to a permanent military policy of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that the bill and accompanying letter from the Secretary of War be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from New York will be complied with.

The bill and accompanying letter from the Secretary of War are as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Army shall consist of general officers of the line, a General Staff Corps, an Adjutant General's Department, a Judge Advocate General's Department, a Quartermaster Corps, a Finance Department, a Transportation Corps, a Motor Transport Corps, a Medical Department (which shall consist of a Medical Corps, a Dental Corps, a Veterinary Corps, and an Army Nurse Corps), a Corps of Engineers, an Ordnance Department, a Signal Corps, an Air Service, a Tank Corps, chaplains, band leaders, a Bureau of Insular Affairs, a Militia Bureau, detached officers, the professors and cadets of the United States Military Academy, detachments for schools and disciplinary barracks, the Infantry, the Cavalry, the Field Artillery, the Coast Artillery Corps, an Officers' Reserve Corps, unassigned recruits, and the officers and enlisted men of the retired list. From and within these several branches the President shall form such military organizations and such territorial, field, or tactical units or organizations as he may deem necessary, all organized as he may prescribe. The Army shall remain as at present constituted by law until the President, under the authority of this act, shall direct otherwise. The President shall merge, as expeditiously as possible after the approval of this act, all now existing departments, bureaus, and offices of the War Department into the organization herein prescribed or authorized; and shall have authority to make such distribution or redistribution of the duties, powers, functions, records, property, and personnel of such previously existing departments, bureaus, and offices as he may deem necessary for the efficiency of the military service, and authority to prescribe the duties, powers, and functions of officers of the services, units, and organizations herein authorized or prescribed.

SEC. 2. General officers of the line: There shall be in the line of the Army 6 lieutenant generals, 32 major generals, and 88 brigadier generals. The general officers of the line who are authorized in this act for the various branches of the service shall be included in these numbers, and the assignment of general officers to any branch, corps, or department shall not create vacancies among general officers of the line.

The Chief of Coast Artillery, officers on the active list who have held the rank of general officer by detail as chief of Staff Corps or bureaus, and the general officers of the staff, except those of the Medical Department, shall, on the passage of this act, be recommissioned as general officers of the line in the grades and with the dates of rank now held by them or heretofore held by them as head of a staff corps or bureau. In time of peace general officers of the line shall be appointed from the next lower grade of the line of the Army.

SEC. 3. The General Staff Corps: The General Staff Corps shall consist of 1 chief of staff, detailed by the President from among the general officers of the line, who, while so detailed, shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a general, and shall take rank and precedence over all other officers of the Army; 5 assistants, who shall be detailed from among general officers of the line; 5 brigadier generals; 41 colonels; 73 lieutenant colonels; 89 majors; 17 captains, all detailed from corresponding grades in the Army as in this section hereinafter provided; 42 regimental sergeants major; 63 battalion sergeants major; 63 sergeants; 21 corporals; and 189 privates, first class. All officers detailed in the General Staff Corps shall be detailed therein for a period of four years, unless sooner relieved. While serving in the General Staff Corps, officers may be temporarily assigned to duty with any branch of the Army. Upon being relieved from duty in the General Staff Corps officers shall return to the branch of the Army in which they hold permanent commissions, and no officer shall be eligible for a further detail in the General Staff Corps until he shall have served two years with the branch of the Army in which commissioned, except in time of actual or threatened hostilities. Section 27 of "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent Military Establishment of the United States," approved February 2, 1901, shall apply to each position vacated by officers below the grade of general officer detailed in the General Staff Corps.

In time of peace no officer shall be detailed as a member of the General Staff Corps, other than the Chief of Staff and the general officers herein provided for as assistants to the Chief of Staff, except upon the recommendation of a board of five officers not below the rank of colonel, who shall be selected by the President or the Secretary of War; not more than two members of the General Staff Corps shall be detailed as members of any such board. No detail of an officer as a member of the General Staff Corps shall be made more than one year after the making of such recommendations or at any time after the convening of another such board, unless again recommended by the new board.

If any officer detailed in the General Staff Corps, or as an officer in any staff corps or department of the Army, shall be promoted to the next higher grade while so serving, he may be permitted to serve out the period of his detail, not exceeding four years, and the number of officers in the organization in which he shall be serving and in the grade to which he shall have been promoted shall be increased by one for such time as he shall be an additional number in said organization and grade; but the whole number of officers detailed to said organization shall at no time exceed the aggregate of the numbers allowed to the several grades thereof by law other than this provision.

The Chief of Staff, under the direction of the President or of the Secretary of War, shall have supervision of all agencies and functions of the Military Establishment, and shall perform such other military duties, not otherwise assigned by law, as may be assigned to him by the President.

The Chief of Staff shall be the immediate adviser of the Secretary of War on all matters relating to the Military Establishment, and shall be charged by the Secretary of War with the planning, development, and execution of the Army program.

The Chief of Staff, by authority of and in the name of the Secretary of War, shall issue orders as will insure that the policies of the War Department are harmoniously executed by the several corps, bureaus, and other agencies of the Military Establishment, and that the Army program is carried out speedily and efficiently.

The duties of the General Staff Corps, under the direction of the Chief of Staff, shall be to prepare plans for the national defense and for the mobilization of the military forces in time of war; to investigate and report upon all questions affecting the efficiency of the Army and its state of preparation for military operations; to render professional aid and assistance to the Secretary of War and to general officers and other superior commanders, and to act as their agents in informing and coordinating the action of all the corps, bureaus, and agencies which are subject under the terms of this act to the supervision of the Chief of Staff; and to perform such other military duties not otherwise assigned by law as may from time to time be prescribed by the President.

Section 5 of "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. Adjutant General's Department: The Adjutant General's Department shall consist of 1 major general; 20 colonels; 48 lieutenant colonels; 53 majors; 141 captains; 68 first lieutenants; 48 regimental sergeants major; 84 battalion sergeants major; 87 first sergeants; 6 sergeants bugler; 6 assistant band leaders; 24 band sergeants; 36 musicians, first class; 1,269 sergeants; 25 supply sergeants; 25 mess sergeants; 36 band corporals; 60 musicians, second class; 1,137 corporals; 120 musicians, third class; 25 mechanics; 25 buglers, first class; 75 cooks; 1,730 privates, first class; 25 buglers; and 375 privates.

Field Artillery: The Field Artillery shall consist of 61 colonels; 61 lieutenant colonels; 163 majors; 793 captains; 1,078 first lieutenants; 1,078 second lieutenants; 142 regimental sergeants major; 143 regimental supply sergeants; 508 first sergeants; 143 battalion sergeants major; 224 master gunners; 61 sergeants bugler; 81 radio sergeants; 122 color sergeants; 61 assistant band leaders; 244 band sergeants; 366 musicians, first class; 3,579 sergeants; 168 stable sergeants; 508 supply sergeants; 508 mess sergeants; 344 horseshoers; 366 band corporals; 610 musicians, second class; 8,926 corporals; 143 corporals bugler; 686 chief mechanics; 1,220 musicians, third class; 488 saddlers; 1,317 mechanics; 1,443 cooks; 447 buglers, first class; 5,160 wagoners; 14,837 privates, first class; 732 buglers; and 18,595 privates.

SEC. 26. Coast Artillery Corps: The Coast Artillery Corps shall consist of 1 major general; 48 colonels; 47 lieutenant colonels; 149 majors; 715 captains; 748 first lieutenants; 728 second lieutenants; 79 master electricians; 166 engineers; 403 assistant engineers; 190 electrician sergeants, first class; 67 sergeants major, senior grade; 36 regimental supply sergeants; 503 first sergeants; 136 sergeants major, junior grade; 147 master gunners; 38 sergeants bugler; 14 color sergeants; 38 assistant band leaders; 171 electrician sergeants, second class; 152 band sergeants; 228 musicians, first class; 3,933 sergeants; 503 supply sergeants; 503 mess sergeants; 221 radio sergeants; 228 band corporals; 380 musicians, second class; 5,991 corporals; 272 firemen; 18 corporals bugler; 48 chief mechanics; 760 musicians, third class; 999 mechanics; 777 wagoners; 1,005 cooks; 486 buglers, first class; 10,059 privates, first class; 496 buglers; 28,983 privates; and the Army Mine Planter Service, which shall consist of 20 masters, 20 first mates, 20 second mates, 20 chief engineers, 40 assistant engineers, 60 oilers, 120 firemen, 80 deck hands, 20 cooks, 20 stewards, and 20 assistant stewards. The number of rated men in the Coast Artillery Corps shall not exceed 2,746.

SEC. 27. Officers' Reserve Corps: The Officers' Reserve Corps shall consist of general officers and sections corresponding to each corps or branch of the Army. The grades in each of these sections shall be those of the corresponding branch of the Army. The number in the lowest grade in any section shall be unlimited. The number in any grade above the lowest in each section shall not exceed such proportions as the President may prescribe.

Reserve officers shall be appointed and commissioned by the President alone, except general officers, who shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Appointments in all cases shall be for a term of five years, but the commission of any reserve officer may, in time of actual or threatened hostilities, be continued in force until six months after the termination of the emergency, notwithstanding the expiration of the five-year term. Any reserve officer may be discharged at any time in the discretion of the President. A reserve officer appointed during the existence of a state of war shall be entitled to discharge within six months after the termination of war, provided he makes application therefor.

To be eligible for appointment or reappointment as a reserve officer a person must be a citizen of the United States, qualified physically and professionally, under such regulations as the President may prescribe.

Subject to the limitations contained in the preceding paragraph, any person who has served as an officer of the United States Army may be appointed as a reserve officer in any grade for which qualified. Any other person originally appointed in the Officers' Reserve Corps in time of peace shall not be appointed to a grade above that of a second lieutenant in the Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, or Infantry section, or to a grade above that of captain in any other section, and such appointees shall be within such age limits as the President may prescribe. No person shall be appointed as a reserve officer in the Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, or Infantry section unless he shall have served honorably as an officer or enlisted man in the United States Army, or shall have completed such course of training or instruction in a school, camp, or other institution as the President may prescribe for the training of such reserve officers. After original appointment in the Officers' Reserve Corps no reserve officer shall be appointed in time of peace to a higher grade until he shall have held an appointment in the next lower grade for at least one year.

A reserve officer on active duty, as hereinafter provided, shall be entitled to the same pay and allowances as an officer of the Army on the active list of the same grade and length of actual service. No reserve officer shall be entitled to pay and allowances except when on active duty.

The Secretary of War is authorized to maintain upon military reservations, or elsewhere, schools or camps for the military instruction of such enlisted men and civilians as may be selected upon their own application for training with a view to their appointment as reserve officers; to use for this purpose such property of the United States as he may deem necessary; to employ thereat officers and enlisted men of the Army and officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps in such numbers and upon such duties as he may designate; and to expend from proper Army appropriations such amounts as he may deem necessary for water, fuel, light, and other expenses incidental to the maintenance of such schools or camps. Civilians shall receive at the expense of the United States subsistence, uniforms, medical supplies, and travel allowances at the rate of 3½ cents per mile for the distance by the shortest usually traveled route from the places from which they are authorized to proceed to the school or camp and for the return travel thereto, the travel pay for the return journey being paid in advance and an allowance of $5 per month in cash for necessary expenses while undergoing training.

In time of actual or threatened hostilities the President may order reserve officers to active service and retain them on such service until the emergency is past. At other times a reserve officer may be ordered to active service in the discretion of the President, but may not be retained on such service without his own consent for a period exceeding 15 days in any one calendar year. While in active service a reserve officer may be assigned to duty or training of any character to which an officer of the same grade and branch of the service of the Army may appropriately be assigned.

Any reserve officer who shall be duly ordered to active service shall, from the time he shall be required by the terms of his order to obey the same, be subject to the laws and regulations for the government of the United States Army, in so far as they are applicable to officers whose permanent retention in the military service, either on the active list or on the retired list, is not contemplated by existing law.

Reserve officers on active duty shall take rank in each grade according to the dates of the orders placing them on such duty.

SEC. 28. Total enlisted strength: The total enlisted force of the United States Army, excluding the Philippine Scouts and the enlisted men of the Medical Department and the unassigned recruits and those on duty at the United States Military Academy, shall not at any one time, except in the event of actual or threatened war or similar emergency in which the public safety demands it, exceed 482,000.

SEC. 29. Unassigned recruits: The number of unassigned recruits at depots or elsewhere shall not exceed 35,000, except in time of actual or threatened hostilities.

SEC. 30. Original vacancies: Original vacancies caused by this act in commissioned grades above the lowest in any branch shall be filled as nearly as practicable in the ratio in which the additional enlisted men herein authorized are procured and by appointment from among officers now holding commissions in the Regular Army and persons not over 40 years of age who have at any time served honorably in the temporary forces of the United States organized since April 6, 1917. Original vacancies in the lowest grades may be filled by appointment from among the same classes of persons or from among the following classes, in order: Graduates of the United States Military Academy, enlisted men of the Army, members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, honor graduates of such distinguished colleges as are now or may hereafter be entitled to preference by orders of the War Department, and other citizens eligible under existing law. No appointment shall be made until the appointee shall have been pronounced by a board of not less than three officers appointed by the President to be physically, morally, and professionally fit for such appointment.

SEC. 31. Appointment of officers: Hereafter all appointments of officers in grades below that of brigadier general shall be by commission in the Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, Corps of Engineers, or one of the corps of the Medical Department, or as chaplain, band leader, or professor at the United States Military Academy. Those now commissioned in said branches will continue under existing commissions; all now otherwise commissioned will be recommissioned with their present grades and date of rank in the Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, Corps of Engineers, as may, in each case, be directed by the President.

Officers for duty in the branches herein authorized and in which officers are not commissioned shall be obtained by temporary details from among officers of corresponding grades in other branches; but no officer below the grade of lieutenant colonel shall be detailed to duty detaching him from the branch in which permanently commissioned for more than four years in any period of six years, except in time of actual or threatened hostilities.

SEC. 32. Details: The President may detail any officer to any military duty he may consider necessary and appropriate, and for such period as he may think proper, subject only to the limitations contained in this act. The detail of officers to college duty and the employment of retired officers on active duty shall be as now provided by law, but all other restrictions or limitations now imposed by law upon the assignment of officers for the performance of duties authorized by law are hereby repealed except as otherwise specifically provided in this act.

SEC. 33. Promotions: Hereafter promotions in each branch of the service to the next to the lowest commissioned grade therein shall, subject to the examination required by existing law, be made according to seniority in the lowest grade of that branch. Promotions to higher grades, below that of general officer, shall be made by selection from the next lower grade in that branch of the service in which the vacancy exists. Any officer thus promoted, by either seniority or selection, shall have rank and pay from the date of occurrence of the vacancy to fill which he was promoted.

Selection for promotion shall be made by a board of not less than five officers appointed by the President, and under such regulations as he may prescribe. The board will be limited in its selection to those officers who have been recommended for selection by their superiors throughout the established chain of command. Whenever this procedure shall not result in filling a vacancy, it shall be filled by promotion by seniority. No officer shall be promoted until he shall have been examined by a board of not less than five officers and pronounced by the board to be suitable for such promotion. Existing laws relating to the examination of officers for promotion are hereby repealed except for promotion from the lowest grade.

Whenever in time of peace an officer in any grade has been passed over in promotion by 25 per cent of the number in that grade and branch, he shall be ordered before a board of five officers appointed by the President, and on the approved finding of such a board that his service has been honest and faithful, he shall be placed on the unlimited retired list; on the approved finding that his service has not been honest and faithful, he will be discharged from the service.

SEC. 34. Termination of certain appointments: Hereafter the appointment of any officer of less than two years' actual commissioned service may be terminated upon the approved finding of a board of officers, convened by the President, that the officer has not the aptitude or qualifications justifying his permanent retention in the service. All laws providing that certain appointments shall be provisional for a period of time are hereby repealed.

SEC. 35. Enlistment period: Hereafter the period of enlistment in the Army shall be three years. Enlisted men now serving under enlistment contracts which provide for their furloughs to the Regular Army Reserve shall be entitled to complete discharge on the completion of three years' service, and such period of three years shall be counted as an enlistment period for purposes of pay; but no enlisted man shall be discharged under the provisions of this section prior to the termination of the present emergency unless the Secretary of War so directs.

While in service enlisted men shall be given the opportunity to study and receive instruction upon educational lines of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations. Civilian teachers may be employed to aid in giving such instruction, part of which may consist of vocational training. The Secretary of War shall prescribe rules and regulations for conducting such instruction and training.

SEC. 36. Abolition of Regular Army Reserve and Enlisted Reserve Corps: The Regular Army Reserve and the Enlisted Reserve Corps are hereby abolished, and their present members shall be discharged from the obligations under which they are serving therein, with the exception of those who are now on active duty, who shall be so discharged upon their relief from active duty.

SEC. 37. Pay of certain enlisted men: Enlisted men whose pay is not specifically fixed by law shall receive the pay of their grade in the first of the following-named branches of the service, in which the pay of the grade is specifically fixed by law: Quartermaster Corps, Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, Signal Corps, Corps of Engineers. The base pay of regimental sergeants major; sergeants major, senior grade; and regimental supply sergeants shall be $75 per month; firemen of the Army Mine Planter Service shall receive increase of pay for length of service as provided for enlisted men whose normal base pay is $36 per month.

SEC. 38. Estimates, appropriations, and apportionments: On or before October 15 of each year the Secretary of War shall transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmission to Congress an estimate of the financial needs of the Army for the ensuing fiscal year, prepared under the supervision of the Chief of Staff, and so arranged with the necessary supporting data as to show the amount required for the support of each service of the Army. Congress shall appropriate in one item for the support of the Army the total amount of money authorized by them therefor for the ensuing fiscal year. Thirty days prior to the first day of each quarter of the fiscal year the Secretary of War shall apportion the amount of money needed during such quarter by the various services for which appropriations have been made. The Chief of Staff shall advise the Secretary of War as to the necessary apportionments and shall cause to be kept such accounts and make such reports as may be necessary to keep the apportionments thus made from being exceeded and to enable the Secretary of War to make additional apportionments or reapportionments during the quarter in the event the regular quarterly apportionments should prove to be deficient or excessive. The same procedure shall be followed as to estimates, appropriations, and apportionmen's in the case of deficiency appropriations should these become necessary.

SEC. 39. Universal training: All male citizens of the United States, all males who have legally declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and all males whose parents have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, subject to such exemptions as are hereinafter authorized, shall undergo such military training as may be prescribed by the President for a period of three months, commencing in the calendar year in which they reach the age of 19 years, except as hereinafter prescribed, and during such training shall be subject to the Articles of War: Provided, That those males who acquire, after the first day of the calendar year in which they reach the age of 19, through their own act or that of a parent, the citizenship status prescribed shall be subject to the training herein prescribed, under the same rules and regulations as apply to citizens whose training is deferred.

SEC. 40. Exemptions and deferments: There shall be exempted from training, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, members of the regular land and naval forces of the United States; persons who have been honorably discharged from the Army and Navy of the United States; members of the Coast Guard; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen, corporation, association, or partnership of the United States; and persons permanently physically, mentally, or morally unfit for any military service whatever.

The President shall, by regulation, defer the training herein provided for in the case of persons under a temporary physical or mental disability and of those persons whose father's, mother's, brother's, sister's, wife's, or child's physical condition is such as to require the personal care and attention of the person and in which the equivalent compensation hereinafter provided would not prevent hardship or suffering. Such deferment shall cease when the cause therefor no longer exists; and such individuals so deferred may be required to submit themselves to such further examinations and investigations as the regulations may require: Provided, That should such deferment continue until the beginning of the calendar year in which the individual attains the age of 25 years, then his liability to training shall terminate.

SEC. 41. Registration and examination: All male persons during their nineteenth year shall be subject to registration and physical examination in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President; and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction, stating the time, place, and manner of such registration and physical examination, it shall be the duty of all such persons to present themselves for and submit to registration, either in person or through the mails, and to physical examination under the provisions of this act and the regulations thereunder and the terms of the proclamation or other notice; and all persons shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of said proclamation or through other public notice as aforesaid; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall upon conviction in the district court of the United States for the district in which the offense occurs be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered and examined for training and trained under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 42. Training districts: For the purpose of this training the President shall divide all the territory within the continental limits of the United States and the Territory of Hawaii and Porto Rico into such training districts or such other subdivisions as may be convenient and necessary.

SEC. 43. Certificates: Each person exempted from training, or whose training has been deferred, shall be furnished with a certificate showing his status and the reasons therefor, and each person who has completed his training shall receive a certificate of training, and any person who shall make, use, or attempt to make or use or procure to be made or used, a certificate without proper authority shall be liable to the penalties of this act as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 44. Expenses to be paid: A person undergoing training under this act shall not be entitled to pay. He shall be entitled to actual cost of transportation and a per diem allowance to be prescribed by the Secretary of War for subsistence to and from the place of training, and to subsistence, clothing, laundry service, medical attendance, and an allowance of $5 per month in cash for necessary expenses while undergoing training.

In cases where the person liable for training shall present satisfactory evidence under regulations to be prescribed therefor that he is supporting by his own labor, in whole or in part, a father crippled, diseased, or aged; a widowed mother, a brother, sister, wife, or child, an amount equal to the average monthly amount such individual has paid toward such support in the six months preceding the training will be paid monthly to such dependent or dependents during the training: Provided, That the amount or amounts so paid shall in no case exceed in the aggregate $50 per month.

SEC. 45. Local boards: The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to create and establish throughout the continental limits of the United States and in the Territory of Hawaii and Porto Rico not to exceed 2,000 local boards. Such boards shall be appointed under regulations to be prescribed by the President and shall consist of three or more members, to be chosen from among Federal or State officials or other citizens: Provided, That no member of such boards shall be a member of the regular land and naval forces of the United States.

The local boards shall have the power within their respective jurisdictions to register and to have physically examined all persons liable to training, and to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption or deferments from training and equivalent compensation.

SEC. 46. Appeal boards: The President is hereby authorized to establish appeal boards, not more than two in each State, Territory, the District of Columbia, and in Hawaii and Porto Rico, each consisting of such number of citizens as the President may determine, who shall be appointed by the President: Provided, That no member of such boards shall be a member of the regular land and naval forces of the United States or of any local board.

Such appeal boards shall review on appeal, and affirm, modify, or reverse any decision of any local board having jurisdiction in the area in which any such appeal board has jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. The decisions of such appeal boards shall be final.

SEC. 47. Induction service: The President shall establish within the War Department an induction service, organized as he may prescribe, to publish and enforce the regulations issued by the President under authority of this act, to keep records, and to perform such other duties with reference to the induction of men as may be directed by the President.

Any vacancy in any local board or any appeal board shall be filled in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the President, and any member of such local board or appeal board may be removed and another appointed in his place by the President.

The President shall make rules and regulations governing the organization and procedure of such local boards and appeals boards and providing the necessary medical and clerical assistants, and providing for and governing appeals from said local boards to said appeal boards and review of the decisions of any local board by the appeal board having jurisdiction, and determining and prescribing the several areas in which the respective local boards and appeal boards shall have jurisdiction, and all other rules and regulations necessary to carry out the terms and provisions of this act with regard to induction.

SEC. 48. Compensation: All persons appointed on either the local boards or appeal boards other than public officials, Federal or State employees, shall be paid not more than $10 per diem for each day they actually serve on such board, and all persons so appointed shall be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred in carrying out their official duties.

SEC. 49. Persons to be utilized for the carrying out of the provisions of this act relating to induction: The President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States, Territory of the United States, the District of Columbia, and, with their consent, of the several States, in the execution of the induction provisions of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States, Territory of the United States, and District of Columbia, and all persons so designated or appointed under regulations prescribed by the President are hereby required to perform such duty as the President shall order or direct, and all such officers and agents and persons so designated or appointed shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of the induction provisions of this act by the direction of the President. Correspondence in the execution of this act may be carried in penalty envelopes bearing the frank of the War Department. Such officers, agents, or persons as may be designated by the President shall administer such oaths as may be necessary to the execution of the induction provisions of this act: Provided, That no charge shall be made for administering such oaths.

SEC. 50. Training forces: The President shall designate the units of the United States Army to which men will be attached for training.

SEC. 51. No further service in peace: In time of peace every person who has completed the training herein provided shall for the two years next succeeding the completion of the training file such reports as the President may by regulations prescribe and shall receive as compensation therefor not more than $1 for each report so filed in accordance with said regulations. Each person immediately upon the completion of his three months' training shall be classified for service in war in accordance with the regulations prescribed by the President, and he shall be reclassified during the two years next following his training according to said regulations whenever his status with respect to physical condition, dependency, or civil industries so changes as to warrant such action. His classification at the termination of his training shall be made by the military authorities. No person on the completion of his training shall be liable for further training or any service in time of peace without his consent.

Upon formal declaration of war by the Congress of the United States, the provisions of the act to increase temporarily the Military Establishment, approved May 18, 1917, as amended by act of Congress approved August 31, 1918, shall immediately become of full force and effect, using as far as possible the organization created by the present act.

SEC. 52. Penalty: Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act relating to training or the regulations made or orders given thereunder, who shall fail and neglect to perform such duty; and any person charged with such duty or having and exercising any authority under said act, regulations, or orders, who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enrollment, or certificate of training, exemption, or temporary deferment; and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate or affidavit to any claim for extra compensation, for himself or for any other person, or as to the fitness or liability of himself or any other person for training or service under this act, or regulations prescribed by the President thereunder, or evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this act or of said regulations, or who in any manner shall fail or neglect fully to perform any duty required of him in the execution of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, if not subject to military law, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year.

SEC. 53. Miscellaneous provisions: Any officer hereafter transferred from the retired to the active list under the provisions of existing law shall be transferred with the rank and date of rank which he holds on the retired list, and shall be an additional number in the branch and grade to which transferred until absorbed.

All officers now carried as additional numbers in any grade and branch of the service shall be included in the numbers provided by this act.

All laws providing that details of officers as aides to general officers or on aviation duty shall carry advanced rank are hereby repealed.

So much of an act of Congress approved April 6, 1918, as provides for the offices of Second Assistant Secretary of War and Third Assistant Secretary of War is hereby repealed.

Officers placed on the retired list for physical disability shall not hereafter form part of the limited retired list.

SEC. 54. Discharge or deprivation of commission: Nothing in this act shall be held or construed so as to discharge any officer from the Regular Army or to deprive him of the commission which he now holds therein.

SEC. 55. Repeal of inconsistent laws: In addition to provisions of law herein specifically repealed, all laws and parts of laws, in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 3, 1919.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WADSWORTH: I inclose you the draft of a proposed bill prepared in the General Staff for the reorganization of the Army. "This is the latest form assumed by our studies on this subject in the War Department. We are still, however, unadvised by that intimate consultation of the experience and judgment of Gen. Pershing and his associates abroad, which would be necessary before a final draft could be said to represent the full opinion of the Army. I would not myself give official approval to a draft which did not contain the results of such a consultation. It is the purpose of your committee, however, to use this draft only as the basis of hearings at which Army officers will be in attendance, both those who have been familiar with the problems on this side and those who have had experience in the Expeditionary Forces."

The bill as inclosed provides a peace-time establishment of 510,000 men and in effect makes permanent the organization which has developed in the War Department, except that it abolishes the Chemical Warfare Service and the Inspector General's Department. The work appropriate to be done by the Chemical Warfare Service in peace time ought, in my judgment, to be carried on in the Engineer Department, and should consist of such research and preparation as would enable our Army always to defend itself against the aggressive use of chemical weapons and to overmatch any adversary in offensive operations should they begin against us. This work is essentially scientific and forms an integral part of the coordinated engineering activities which ought, in the future, to center around the Engineer Department, and make it supply not merely the technical civil engineering needed upon public works and fortifications familiar to the Army but all of the engineering—chemical, physical, and mechanical—whereby the achievements of pure science are carried into the realm of practical application in an intensive way should war demand their use.

With regard to the Inspector General's Department, it is clear that the inspection of purely military training ought to be centralized and carried out under the direction of the training division of the General Staff. Whether or not, however, certain other functions of the Inspector General's Department should not be left as they now are, independent of all military control, and reporting directly to the Secretary of War, is a question upon which a full expression of opinion ought to be had.

The bill as drawn makes the selective-service act as amended a part of our permanent legislation. The importance of a recognition of this system as a means of getting men in time of war is obvious. Our experience has demonstrated the efficiency of the act under which we operated in the present war, and if it is made a part of our permanent legislation its readiness in time of emergency will increase its effectiveness.

The bill recognizes the principle of promotion by selection as essential to efficiency in the Army. The present situation is that noncommissioned officers are made and promoted by selection, as are also officers above the grade of colonel. The test of war showed that promotion by seniority was inapplicable, and it had to be abandoned. So far as I know, not a single voice was raised during this recent emergency in favor of any other plan than the rigid and unsparing application of the tests of merit and fitness for promotion. There is no reason for going back to the seniority rule. It would be unjust to the officers who in this war have demonstrated superior merit, and unjust to the Army and the country to deprive them of these proved talents in favor of the lower average of efficiency which the seniority rule admittedly produces. It is not, however, proposed to have a system of selection by chance or favor or affection, but a selection based upon efficiency and merit, with every safeguard possible to prevent its abuse.

The bill as drawn provides for a system of universal training for a very brief period applicable to all male citizens of the United States in their twentieth year, with suitable provisions for exemptions and deferments. It does not, however, provide for any reserve obligation, since that is unnecessary with a system of universal service in time of emergency. The period suggested for training is brief, but not too brief, it is believed, to secure a careful stock taking of the health and physical condition of the young manhood of the Nation and the institution of such remedial measures as may be practicable, nor too brief to initiate the habits of orderliness, coordination, and self-care which proved so valuable in the recent training of men preparing for active military service. Nor is this period believed to be too brief to entail great advantage to the country should any future emergency require it to call for service.

The bill provides for the Reserve Officers' Corps and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and under it it is proposed to give the Army the best academic education and the most thorough vocational training we can provide. The country has never faced so great an opportunity to attach to its service men trained in the school of experience. We now have many trained officers, not merely those who have been brought in through Regular Army channels but the splendid body of officers from the National Guard and from the officers' training camps and schools who have learned under actual war conditions the business of the soldier. There are available to us great groups of men qualified to exercise command and perform the staff duties which are of permanent importance and most difficult to organize.

It will be observed that the bill suggests no change in existing law with regard to the organization of the National Guard and its relation to the Regular Army. It is assumed that the national-defense act federalizing the guard will be retained in force, and that if any readjustment of its relation to the Regular Army is desired it will be suggested in the hearings.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

COL. EDWARD SIGERFOOS.

Mr. POMERENE. I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 2717) authorizing the issuance and delivery of a commission of brigadier general for Edward Sigerfoos was read twice by its title.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I want to say just one word in regard to the bill. It provides for the issuance and delivery of a commission as brigadier general for Col. Edward Sigerfoos. I will state the facts briefly.

Col. Sigerfoos was one of the ablest of the military men from Ohio. He was in France, and on September 29 he was ordered to take his place in the line. On October 4 the President sent his nomination to the Senate as brigadier general. On October 10 it was confirmed by the Senate. But on October 7 he died as the result of a shell wound received in action. He never knew that he had been advanced to the rank of brigadier general.

The commission was issued by The Adjutant General and sent to Mrs. Sigerfoos. On October 21 The Adjutant General learned of the death of Col. Sigerfoos and wrote to the widow asking the return of the commission, because there was no legal authority to issue it. She desires that the commission be issued now as a heritage for her fatherless children, and I hope that the committee may find some way to grant the proper relief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CARS FOR COAL SHIPMENTS.

Mr. POMERENE. I submit the following resolution and ask that it may be read, and after it is read I shall ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 152) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Director General of Railroads be, and is hereby, directed to give the Senate the following information:

First. Give the total number of coal cars now in use in the transportation of coal and the number of empty coal cars belonging to the several railroad companies under the control of the Director General of Railroads which are suitable and available for the transportation of coal.

Second. State whether the coal cars belonging to the railroads and under said control are now sufficient or have been during the past six months to meet the demand therefor.

Third. State the number of the coal cars which have been constructed or purchased for the account of the Director General of Railroads which are under his control and which have not been sold or transferred to the several railroad companies, and, if they have not been sold or transferred to the several railroad companies, give the reasons therefor.

Fourth. State fully the methods adopted by the Director General for the purpose of supplying the producers of coal with the necessary cars for transportation of coal to the consumers.

Fifth. State what, if any, further action by Congress is required in order to meet the demands for the transportation of coal.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may say a word in support of the resolution, on Saturday I received a telegram, which, with the consent of the Senate, I shall read. It comes from a friend who is interested in the coal business and is a practicing lawyer. He says:

It is the conviction of coal men that serious coal shortage probably equal to coal famine of 1918 will result next winter. The mines have experienced the most serious car shortage ever experienced. In July operators' association met in Fairmont, W. Va., district to make united effort to remedy situation. Am informed that the thousands of coal cars bought by the Government have not been turned over to the railroad for use on account of the difference in purchase price by Government and selling price; that these thousands of new cars, unlettered and unnumbered, are standing on the sidetracks throughout the country. If mines are unable to get these cars through the car shortage, this shortage will be very serious later. Believe Congress should take some immediate action to make these cars available for immediate use. Entire output of our mines is sold for year. Our labor supply ample, but short of cars. Informed that this is generally true of all districts. Am advised by fuel purchaser of a large railroad system as follows: "All indications point to quite a serious car shortage to be experienced in the fall and winter." Now is the time to avoid this situation, and the matter should be brought to the attention of the administration, as a coal shortage or coal famine, which will mean high prices on top of other intolerable conditions, will be very bad. As the author of coal-regulation amendment thought you might be interested.

I may say that I have a letter stating that one large company in West Virginia has a contract to deliver coal in the New England States, largely for the use of the railroads in those States, but they are not able to get the cars now to make the shipments to New England.

This morning I had a letter from a coal dealer at Norwood, Ohio, which is near Cincinnati. He says, with regard to present prices:

We have had offered to us Pocahontas lump coal at $5.25 per ton this week. The Government price on this coal was $2.60 per ton. In other coals the mine price has increased about $1 per ton for the domestic grades.

Mr. President, this situation is, no doubt, becoming very serious. In the mines in southeastern Ohio in the spring—I am not advised as to the condition now—the coal miners were out of employment. The other day I received a number of newspaper advertisements inserted by coal operators urging the public to buy coal now, because coal was going to be higher in the future, and now we are told that there are not enough coal cars supplied to the mines. Whether there is a shortage or not, I do not know. I am asking for that information.

I am also informed that a large number of coal cars were manufactured for the account of the Director General of Railroads, and that they have not been distributed to the several companies because of the fact that the price asked by the Director General is in excess of what the companies are willing to pay.

I think the Senate will be interested in having this information to the end that they may give relief if it is possible to give relief, and for that reason I ask the present consideration of the resolution which I presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read again.

Mr. POMERENE. It simply asks for information from the Director General of Railroads.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not know exactly what the condition is now, but in January, 1918, when the Government took over the railroads every railroad man, as the Senator will recollect, urged that contracts be let at once for additional cars. As a matter of fact, instead of letting the contracts at once at a price which could have been obtained at that time and which was fairly reasonable, the administration spent over five months trying to standardize all the equipment of the railroads in the United States instead of getting the cars which the country needed and having every manufacturer busy making them. It was announced in May or June that a contract for 100,000 cars had been let. Such a contract may have been let, but, as a matter of fact, there were not 20,000 of those cars delivered in the entire year 1918. It is not at all surprising that there is a shortage of coal cars under those circumstances.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there is force in what the Senator has said; but I am told there is a large number of those new cars on hand undelivered. I should also say that there is a large number of coal cars—at least, I have been so advised—which are, perhaps, out of repair and could be put in proper repair so that they would be available for use. I think it is true that there was some time wasted in trying to standardize these cars—as if one car suitable for the transportation of coal into New England would not be suitable in the Rocky Mountain region or in the Middle West. Practical railroad men do not do that kind of thing.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I might add to what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] stated that there were other difficulties existing at that time. According to the evidence taken before a committee of the Senate, it appeared that the coal cars which belonged to the railroads at the time were not being used efficiently; that the average mileage for railroad cars, I believe, was about 8 or 10 miles; and that to take a load of coal from the mines to a point 100 miles away and return the car required a month's time. That was the situation which existed in January, 1918, when the Government took over the railroads. It has been a question in my mind, and I have had no information regarding it since, as to whether there were plenty of coal cars in existence at the time if they had been properly utilized.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will state to the Senator that in 1917 the amount of business done by the railroads with their then equipment exceeded the amount of business done in 1918.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

The resolution was agreed to.

INDIANS OF DUCHESNE AND UINTA COUNTIES, UTAH.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, during the morning hour the Senate was engaged in a very interesting debate and I had no opportunity to present a resolution which I now ask unanimous consent to present and to have considered. The resolution relates to certain information desired from the Department of the Interior. It is so interlined that I shall ask permission to read it myself. It is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Interior is directed to report to the Senate the number of Indians residing in Duchesne and Uinta Counties, Utah, the amount of land held for such Indians, the number of Indians actually residing upon lands which they cultivate, the number of acres actually cultivated and irrigated by them, the quantity of water which is claimed by the Department of the Interior for and upon behalf of such Indians, the number of acres of land which such water is intended to irrigate, and what steps are being taken by or under the direction of the Interior Department to divert and use such water for irrigation purposes upon Indian lands, how much of the water resources of said Uinta and Duchesne Counties are claimed by the Interior Department for such Indians, and how much land the whole of said waters are capable of serving for irrigation purposes; also, what litigation has been initiated by the Interior Department against the white settlers residing within said counties and the purpose of the same and the effect of said litigation upon said settlers if the claims of the plaintiff in said suit should be successful; also, what part of the water resources of said counties the Department of the Interior concedes to be available for the appropriation and use by white settlers residing therein for irrigation purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution (S. Res. 153) was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, some difference of opinion has arisen as to interpretation of the provision in article 1 of the covenant of the league of nations regarding the withdrawal of members of the league. In my address to the Senate several weeks ago I took a position in regard to that provision of the league. I requested Mr. Miller, who was one of the legal advisers of the peace commissioners at Paris and who, I understand, was present at all the meetings at which the covenant of the league of nations was considered and determined, to make a memorandum for me regarding the interpretation of that provision contained in article 1 of the covenant of the league. I have received from Mr. Miller the memorandum, and as it is very short I should like to have it read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Memorandum.]

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"OFFICE OF THE UNDERSECRETARY,
"July 31, 1919.

"The first draft of the covenant contained no clause of withdrawal and this was one ground of criticism in various quarters. To meet this criticism the following was inserted as the last paragraph of article 1:

"Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

"The contention is now advanced that in some way this clause would permit the right of withdrawal to be passed on by the council of the league of nations or, at any rate, does not leave the matter entirely under the control of the withdrawing member.

"This contention is wholly unfounded. The language gives an absolute right of withdrawal to every member of the league upon two years' notice, coupled with a promise on the part of the member so withdrawing to live up to its international obligations until the end of the two-year period.

"In other words, the paragraph makes explicit the thought that during the two-year period membership in the league continues. It is at the end of the two-year period that liability ends.

"The matter may be looked at from two points of view—the general spirit and purpose of the covenant and the precise language of the paragraph itself.

"The provisions of the covenant generally show that there is not the slightest thought of keeping in the league an unwilling member.

"By article 26 no member of the league can be compelled to accept any amendment to the covenant, however slight. Upon its dissent therefrom it ceases to be a member of the league. Still more significant is the last paragraph of article 16. This provides for the expulsion of a member of the league by the unanimous vote of all other members represented on the council. The ground for expulsion is the violation of 'any covenant of the league.'

"This provision obviously has intimate connection with the withdrawal clause. Given an absolute right of withdrawal on two years' notice without more it might have been contended that expulsion would not be possible during the two-year period. But coupled with the explicit promise on the part of the withdrawing member to fulfill its engagements during the two-year period, it is quite clear that the thought expressed by the covenant as a whole is that a hostile member shall not be permitted to remain a member, and an unwilling member shall not be required to remain.

"A technical examination of the precise language of the paragraph of article 1 leads to the same conclusion. The first words of the paragraph admittedly give complete right of withdrawal. 'Any member of the league may after two years' notice * * * withdraw from the league.' Any qualification or limitation of this right of withdrawal must be sought in the following words:

"Provided, That all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

"These words are not to be construed to qualify the right of withdrawal but rather to introduce an obligation continuing until the withdrawal itself. The final words 'at the time of its withdrawal' show that the obligation is limited to the period of membership and has either been fulfilled or breached at the time of withdrawal. Obviously any limitation of the right of withdrawal would have to be in the nature of a condition precedent, which if not fulfilled, would prevent the withdrawal from occurring. An instance of such a condition precedent is the notice, which must be given two years in advance. The language which has been quoted (while in the form of a proviso) assumes withdrawal to have been completed by speaking of the withdrawal as a fact—in other words the very language which is supposed to show a limitation of the right of withdrawal, conclusively shows that no limitation is intended.

"Suppose it were claimed by some power that the withdrawing member had not so lived up to its obligations, what would have to be alleged? First, that the withdrawing power had not fulfilled some one or more of its obligations, and second, that it had not fulfilled such obligations at the time of its withdrawal from the league. Thus, the contention that the fact of withdrawal could depend on the fulfillment of the proviso is conclusively answered, for any allegation of breach of the proviso would have to admit the fact of withdrawal from the league.

"It is impossible to discover any foundation for the argument advanced that in some way the council of the league (or the assembly) would have jurisdiction to pass upon the question of withdrawal. To exist, such jurisdiction would have to be expressly conferred. No such jurisdiction is mentioned or even implied in the covenant. The right of withdrawal is given to each member of the league in its own uncontrolled discretion as not even a reason for withdrawal need be alleged. The jurisdiction of the council in the case of certain disputes between members has by some been mentioned in connection with the subject, but that jurisdiction extends only to inquiry in such cases as are not submitted to arbitration and which (article 15) are likely to lead to a rupture.

"Before a member withdraws from the league, even during the two-year period, doubtless the council may be called on to report as to any dispute between members, but this would be before withdrawal and could, of course, have nothing to do with the subsequent fact of withdrawal.

"After withdrawal the conclusion is equally clear. The member has become a nonmember and bears the same relation to the league as any other nonmember. There is no other possible case.

"Any dispute before withdrawal would be the ordinary case under article 15; but under this paragraph of Article I, no dispute could arise until after 'the time of its withdrawal.'

"To sum up the matter, the covenant provides for withdrawal on two years' notice by any member. During the two-year period the liability of the member under the covenant continues. At the end of the two years the State which gave the notice is not longer a member of the league.

"DAVID HUNTER MILLER."

PEACE TREATY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, on Thursday next, if the Senate is in session, and if not on the next day when the Senate meets, I shall address the Senate after the conclusion of the morning business on the subject of the peace treaty, more particularly the league of nations and the question of reservations and amendments.

PAYMENT OF WAR DEPARTMENT OBLIGATIONS.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 165) to allow the payment of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 7, 66th Cong., H. R. 5227), was read twice by its title.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this joint resolution is practically identical with one which was unanimously passed by the Senate a week or 10 days ago. It differs from the Senate joint resolution only in that it provides that the Secretary of War may pay contractors for the materials purchased "and delivered" in accordance with the terms of the contract into which they entered with the Government. The Senate joint resolution did not contain the words "and delivered." The House joint resolution in a sense is more restrictive upon the power of the Secretary of War than is the Senate joint resolution, but the two are so closely alike that I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution in order that the legislation may be expedited.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers to the House joint resolution just laid before the Senate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To the resolution just laid before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from New York that under the rule it must be referred to the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I appreciate that.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator from New York could report it and ask unanimous consent for its consideration. If the RECORD will show that action, I shall have no objection to the joint resolution being considered at this time. Let the joint resolution be referred to the committee, and the Senator can report it out immediately.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is merely a matter of mechanics. To consider the joint resolution now will simply save a committee report on a matter upon which it has already reported and upon which the Senate has already acted.

Mr. KING. I suggest to the Senator from New York that he might consult the committee and report the resolution nunc pro tunc a little later.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, I realize that the rule provides that joint resolutions shall be referred to committees, but I have asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of this joint resolution in order to save the time of the committee and the time of the Senate. The Senate has already acted upon this very matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Utah to object to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object; but I always like to have the rule observed which provides that such measures shall first be referred to a committee. I suppose, of course, that we can do anything by unanimous consent, if we desire. I shall not object at this time, but I really believe that the proper way is to have every bill or joint resolution referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York that the joint resolution be considered by unanimous consent?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Whereas by an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 7, 66th Cong., H. R. 5227), it is provided as follows:

"That no part of any of the appropriations made herein nor any of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the Army or the Military Establishment shall be expended for the purchase of real estate for the construction of Army camps or cantonments except in such cases at National Army or National Guard camps or cantonments which were in use prior to November 11, 1918, where it has been or may be found more economical to the Government for the purpose of salvaging such camps or cantonments to buy real estate than to continue to pay rentals or claims for damages thereon, and except where industrial plants have been constructed or taken over by the Government for war purposes and the purchase of land is necessary in order to protect the interest of the Government" and

Whereas doubt exists as to the proper interpretation of said provision and as to the intention of Congress in enacting the same: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the foregoing provision of said act shall not be construed to prevent the payment from the unexpended balances of said appropriations of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and actually produced under the terms of the contract prior to the approval of said act.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONGRATULATORY RESOLUTIONS FROM FOREIGN COUNTRIES (S. DOC. NO. 68).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State communicating resolutions and telegrams of congratulation addressed to the Senate of the United States by the Senate of Spain, the Senate of Chile, the Senate of Paraguay, and by the President of the Brazilian National Congress in the name of that body.

Inclosure: Report of the Secretary of State.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
31 July, 1919.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 7110. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across Flint River, in the State of Georgia, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 7785. An act to provide revenue for the Government, to establish and maintain in the United States the manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, optical glass, scientific and surgical instruments, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE PEACE TREATY AND THE COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I shall be glad if I may be permitted to proceed with my remarks without interruption.

Mr. President, I had the honor of being one of the 37 signers of the resolution known as the Lodge resolution, offered near the close of the last session, and which briefly expressed the opposition of the signers of the resolution to that constitution of a league of nations which a short time before had been approved by the plenary conference at Paris.

There had already been considerable discussion of the proposed constitution in the Senate. After the adjournment there was yet more discussion from the platform and in the press of the country.

The President of the United States, while not the author of the original constitution of the league of nations, was easily the most prominent figure in finally securing its approval by the peace conference. This apparently had been his main concern in attending the conference and acting as the chief representative of the United States. He was understood as being opposed to any change in the original draft or to any discussion by the Senate until the constitution was finally laid before the Senate along with the peace treaty proper for ratification. But the discussion of the covenant could not thus be stayed. Indeed, at the time of the approval of the first draft at the peace conference it was the avowed understanding of the representatives of Great Britain, France, and Italy, who sat on the league of nations committee with our distinguished President, that the work of the committee was not to be considered as a finality, but that it was to be the subject of discussion and criticism, with a view, of course, to amendment in those particulars in regard to which the criticisms appeared to be just and reasonable.

It was in this spirit, I think, that the discussion went on in the United States. I take it that there was a general sentiment in favor of some league of nations that would in some way prevent war and promote or insure the peace of the world. The notion of how such a league should be constituted, what its powers should be, how it might affect our national sovereignty, what departure, if any, on the part of the United States from time-honored international policies would be involved, was necessarily vague and indefinite. But the discussion that followed proved to be of great value; it cleared up some of these obscurities; it brought again to the minds of the people the deep solicitude of the founders of the Republic for its future welfare, their warning against entangling alliances, their more immediate concern in the interests of the Western Hemisphere. The discussion not only brought home the fact that from the beginning until now we had consistently adhered to these foundation principles, but that in doing so we had, in our material growth and development and in the evident permanency and security of our free institutions, become the marvel and the admiration of all the world.

And so the people hesitated to indorse the league in its original form; and is it a matter of wonder that they should have hesitated? Whatever might have happened had our policy been otherwise they could say, "We are what we are; our country is what it is. How could it have been greater or prospered more under a policy which would have opened the way for foreign complications or invited foreign controversies? How infinitely less in power and influence we might have been had the admonitions of Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, and Adams, in regard to foreign alliances, gone unheeded."

Thus they have reasoned. Mr. President, I can well imagine some good, reasonably well-informed, but average citizen, farmer, merchant, or workingman, a patriotic American, proud of his country and its achievements, profoundly interested, too, in the welfare of mankind, coming at last in his reasoning to the conclusion that out of this mainspring of devotion to these cardinal principles of the fathers, and from these alone, have come the Nation and the people who have contributed such a magnificent part in the winning of this war for liberty and humanity.

Mr. President, you will not be able to stampede or deceive such a citizen by any claim that the opposition to the covenant of a league of nations in its present form is factious or partisan. He knows the old landmarks. History has for him its lessons, which he believes should serve as some guide for future conduct and policy, and when it comes to the protection and defense of American rights, founded on these time-honored principles, you can not scare him with war, nor is he too proud to fight. Moreover, he may find ample justification for his thoroughgoing Americanism in some very choice, and I may say eloquent, utterances by our distinguished President himself, like this, for example, which describes adherence to American principle as a passion:

> The passion of America is to be permitted to live her own life according to her own principle. The only thing that she profoundly resents or ever will profoundly resent is having her life and freedom interfered with.

Or this, which describes the need of men who think first of America:

> We particularly need now men who will divest themselves of party passion and of personal preference and will try to think in the terms of America. If a man describes himself to me now in any other terms than those terms, I am not sure of him, and I love the fellows who come to my office sometimes and say: "Mr. President, I am an American." Their hearts are right; their instinct true; they are going in the right direction and will take the right leadership if they believe that the leader is also a man who thinks first of America.

And this tells how America should come first:

> America must come first in every purpose we entertain, and every man must count upon being cast out even of our tolerance who does not submit to that great ruling principle.

In 1915 the same high authority declared:

> There have been some among us who have not thought first of America, who have sought to use the might of America in some matter not of America's origination, and have forgotten that the first duty of a nation is to express its own individual principles in the action of the family of nations and not to seek aid and abet any rival or contrary ideal.

But it is always back to "first principles," whether speaking in praise or censure or kindly admonition, whether deprecating preparedness or urging preparedness, the old ideals, traditions, and standards are invoked for present inspiration and guidance, as witness the following in 1916:

> When we prepare for national defense we prepare for national political integrity; we prepare to take care of the great ideals which gave birth to this Government; we are going back in spirit and in energy to those first great generations in America when men banded themselves together, though they were but a handful, upon a single coast of the Atlantic, to set up in the world the standards which have ever since floated everywhere that Americans have asserted the power of this Government.

But this, earlier in 1916:

> There are actually men in America who are preaching war, who are preaching the duty of the United States to do what it never would before—seek entanglements in the controversies which have arisen on the other side of the water—abandon its habitual and traditional policy and deliberately engage in the conflict which is now engulfing the rest of the world. I do not know what the standard of citizenship of these gentlemen may be. I only know that I, for one, can not subscribe to those standards.

And now, Mr. President, with the citizen's deep regard for the old landmarks strengthened, with his apprehension lest the Ship of State venture too far upon a dangerous and unknown sea, quickened by the philosophy and statesmanship revealed in the words I have quoted, what wonder that he should here, in this momentous time, cry out for safeguards against a policy so new and so opposed to that which he had always believed in and cherished.

And this, Mr. President, is not to say that our average citizen is opposed to any league of nations. The Lodge resolution is not opposed to any league of nations. On the contrary, it expresses "their sincere desire that the nations of the world should unite to promote peace and general disarmament." In doing so, I think, it expressed the general sense; but in expressing opposition to the constitution of the league as first drafted, it also, I am confident, represented the general sense of the people of the United States.

The resolution and the discussion following were not without their effect on the proceedings at Paris. There was further conference and deliberation there, and after several weeks we are handed the new and revised covenant as a part of the treaty of peace. Does it meet the objections raised to the first proposed constitution, or does it, as was feared of the former document, involve an abandonment of the principles of America, the destroying of "the passion of America to live her own life according to her own principle"? If it does destroy or impair that passion, then of course we are ready to put to hazard the principle, and with it the national well-being which was founded upon it.

Let us examine briefly what has been done or what has been omitted in the draft now before us:

First, complaint was made because the original draft contained no provision permitting withdrawal from membership in the league. The objection was a serious one and seriously taken. The omission is alleged to have been cured by the new paragraph in new article 1, which permits any member of the league, after two years' notice of its intention to do so, to withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of the withdrawal. And this is the much-vaunted remedy for the omission from the original draft of leave to withdraw from the league.

Mr. President, I do not overlook the memorandum which, at the instance of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], was read into the RECORD a little while ago—the memorandum of Mr. Miller, construing article 1 of the covenant. Without having had the opportunity to examine in detail that long and involved explanation and construction—and there must be something very intricate about the article or else it would not require such an involved and lengthy explanation as has been given it by Mr. Miller—what I shall say here in regard to article 1 is with the view that it does not bear the construction given by Mr. Miller and that the meaning of the paragraph in article 1 which he attempts to construe would prevent the withdrawal from the league of any nation seeking to withdraw until it had fulfilled all its obligations—its international obligations and its obligations under the covenant. I think that is the plain meaning of the paragraph and that such is the construction generally put upon it.

Mr. President, I do not know how it may appeal to others, but to my mind if there ever was a proposition which involves a surrender of complete national sovereignty it is the one in this league covenant relating to withdrawal. Read the whole proposition and then read it again. The right to withdraw is contingent, contingent upon the fulfillment of two classes of obligations by the nation seeking to withdraw: First, all its international obligations; and, secondly, all its obligations under this covenant. Of course, the obligations under the covenant are international; but, in addition to the requirement that these be fulfilled before withdrawal, any covenants which we have entered into in the long years since we became a sovereign Nation, and which are yet continuing covenants or obligations, must be fulfilled before we can withdraw from this supreme covenant—this lord over all.

The very international covenants which we have entered into, or which we believe for our own welfare we should enter into, might become all-sufficient and all-compelling reasons for our withdrawal from the league of nations. Our present peace and safety might be good grounds for seeking to withdraw, but there is that barrier of unfulfilled obligations which we can not pass and, on the face of it, whatever the conditions which confront us and which plead for relief through our withdrawal, you have your country enmeshed in obligations under the covenant and international obligations not under the covenant, and all so bound together by this strong chain of the supercovenant that it will be impossible for your country to ever again be free and sovereign; provided always, that the stipulations of article 1 are to be regarded as of any binding force.

As I study this language and give credit, as I must, to knowledge on the part of the members of the committee framing the covenant, of the continuing nature of many international obligations, I am forced to one or the other of two conclusions: Either, first, that they intended that notice and application to withdraw should prove ineffective and that therefore membership in the league would be perpetual; or, secondly, that these strong words permitting withdrawal only on contingencies not likely to happen in the case of any great nation were so much camouflage, meant to deter whom it might, with the smaller nations or those inclined to be recalcitrant especially in mind. If the first should be the true view we wonder at the audacity of the statesmanship that so gambles with national sovereignty. If the latter, we can not think of it as a performance which comports with the greatness and dignity of the occasion or the cause.

Mr. President, I shall not dwell on this feature of the covenant longer, save to say, that were it not for other objections I might, notwithstanding the provisions in regard to withdrawal, vote to ratify the treaty and covenant.

And why? Because of the very futility of the attempt made in this stipulation to impair or destroy the sovereign rights of the United States. Because it is beyond the power of the President to negotiate and beyond the power of the Senate to ratify a treaty which irrevocably surrenders the power of the Nation to determine for itself whether it had fulfilled or whether it should, under any and all circumstances, fulfill its treaty obligations. Aside from the question of national supremacy under our dual system of government, it is only in relation to international questions, rights, or obligations that we speak of sovereignty at all. A necessary attribute of full sovereignty from the standpoint of international law is the independence of a State of every other State in the matter of its international rights and in the matter of its own domestic policies.

But, if a power outside ourselves may prescribe, supervise, and control our action in regard to our international obligations, how can we be said to be a sovereign Nation? If Congress can not abrogate a burdensome treaty, or one under which conditions have changed, because article 1 of the covenant stands in the way, what difference in principle between such a case and one where the legislation of one State in regard to foreign affairs binds the subjects of another State? Who could contend that the latter was a sovereign State, or what difference in principle between the case made by article 1 and the case of a State bound to submit any treaty it had made to the approval of another State before it can become effective? In either case there is a loss or lack of the highest attribute of sovereignty—the right of a State to determine for itself its international relations.

But despite the stipulations of article 1 of the covenant, there is a power that, under our Constitution, no President or Senate or both can override, and that is the power of Congress to abrogate any treaty made, and of this every incipient member of your league of nations has notice. Again and again has the power been exercised. It is now universally accepted doctrine that a treaty is the supreme law so long only as it remains unrepealed by act of Congress. Mr. Roosevelt, as governor of New York, in 1900, writing Mr. John Hay, our then great Secretary of State, said: "As for existing treaties, I do not admit the 'dead hand' of the treaty-making power in the past. A treaty can always be honorably abrogated, though," he adds, "it must never be abrogated in dishonest fashion."

But, Mr. President, to come to another point, more important even than this. It is more important because it involves the abandonment of one time-honored American policy which the fathers of the Republic advised and our immediate adoption of another against which they most earnestly warned. I can not vote to ratify this treaty and covenant without reservations.

On the 12th day of June I introduced Senate resolution No. 78, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I may be pardoned for reading that resolution now. It is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the ratification of the terms of the treaty of peace, including the covenant for a league of nations, lately proposed by the allied powers and associated nations to Germany and to Austria, should be on the following express conditions or reservations, to be attached to and become a part of said treaty and covenant and not otherwise:

"That the United States of America, in view of their remote situation with reference to European States or other States of the Eastern Hemisphere and their more immediate interest in the territorial integrity and free institutions of the sovereign States of the Western Hemisphere, the policies concerning which and the cordial relations with which the United States will endeavor to maintain, expressly reserve to themselves the right to determine through the Congress the justice or expediency of any fulfillment on the part of the United States of the obligations contained in or imposed by article 10 of the covenant for league of nations so far as such obligations may at any time apply to the situation of any State or States of the Eastern Hemisphere."

This or a similar reservation should, it seems to me, be unhesitatingly accepted.

It has bearing upon the much-discussed article 10 of the covenant and the new article 21 relating to "regional understandings."

And here, Mr. President, I am disposed to invoke a familiar principle of legal procedure. The burden of proof is on him who charges or alleges the fact, the issuable fact. In debate likewise every affirmative has cast upon it the burden of proof or of argument. The burden of proof is on the proponents of this treaty and covenant and of article 10 thereof.

What is the allegation in substance?

It is that America's existing political order and international policies are not what they should be; that a radical change is necessary; that, notwithstanding we have for more than a century religiously adhered to the principle of noninterference in European affairs, we must now of a sudden abandon the policy which Washington and other founders of the Republic most devoutly advised, and be ready on occasion to participate in an economic war or a military war against any nation charged with an assault upon the territorial integrity or the political independence of any other nation who may be a member of the league of nations. We are to pledge ourselves to engage in this war, not upon the decision of the Congress or of the Executive of the United States, or both, as to the merits or the justice of the cause, but upon the decision of a body almost entirely, or with the exception of one lone representative, alien to us, and it may be, for the time at least, hostile to our own development, our own purposes, and ideals.

What Senator two years ago would have supported such a proposal? What Senator would have dared bring it before the Senate? Aye, I go further than that. What American advocate of a league of nations to enforce peace, in or out of the Senate, ever contemplated a program which imposed upon America the obligations of article 10 of this covenant, to guarantee the political independence and the territorial sovereignty of any other nation, great or small, monarchy, autocracy, or republic, ignorant or advanced, near or remote in point of distance from our own shores, and to make such guaranty, too, without regard to the righteousness of the cause of the nation whose political independence or territorial integrity is assailed, to say nothing of the distance, expense, and sacrifice which our intervention would involve for us?

Any man who two years ago would have made such a proposal would have been regarded as an idle dreamer not to be taken seriously or one whose Americanism, if not loyalty, might be a subject of doubt.

Mr. President, men have differed widely and honestly in their opinions of America as a world power. There are those who have deplored any acquisition, under whatever circumstances, to our territorial domain. Especially have they opposed acquisitions that were not continental; they would have confined international activities to necessary and legitimate international trade. Beyond that there should be no thought of an American sphere of influence or of American participation in world affairs. They said we are self-sufficient and there is no need of an aggressive policy or even commercial policies which might make complications or invite a quarrel.

On the other hand, there were the men of vision, as they were called, who declared that Dewey's guns at Manila Bay were heard round the world, and that the United States was thenceforward to be recognized as a world power in a new and mighty sense—men who would have wished for America what that gifted and imperial statesman, Cecil Rhodes, wished for England, which was nothing less than the "governance of the world by the British race."

And yet no American imperialist, with American traditions and policies behind him and any dream of American greatness or "governance" before him, would have had the audacity to propose the guaranty of the political independence and territorial integrity of other nations as a means for the exercise of American power and influence. Nor, power aside, would he have accepted for his country the risks of such an obligation as a means to the fulfillment of America's mission to mankind or on the chance that it would bring lasting peace to the world. The fact is that the scheme—the utterly alien and un-American scheme—involved in article 10 was never heard of until now. The celebrated Fourteen Points gave no warning of it. I doubt if the author of the Fourteen Points, prior to his meeting with the committee of the peace conference, ever visualized for a moment the guaranties of that article. The nation—the one nation of the world—who may profit, and surely will never suffer or be embarrassed, by article 10 is Great Britain, one of whose representatives at the peace table is the reputed author of the original draft of the league of nations—of the draft, at least, which was the basis for the action of the committee framing the covenant.

But it is all new and strange to America; it is a complete reversal of the policies of the past, under which we have grown great and powerful.

The burden of proof is on the advocates of ratification without change to show the wisdom and the justice of the fateful course now proposed. The burden is not an easy one; it is as great as the proposal itself is new and startling.

To come to the question, Why the proposal now, and what the source of some of the sentiment behind it?

The activities of our own American voluntary association, or League to Enforce Peace, will in part answer the question.

Some time ago I received from a constituent a letter written the constituent by Mr. W. R. Boyd, jr., national campaign manager of our so-called League to Enforce Peace. The letter is written on the imposing letterhead of the league, with William Howard Taft as the president. In the margin is a formidable array of the names of persons who constitute the executive committee. The letter is as follows:

[League to Enforce Peace. President, William Howard Taft; Alton B. Parker, vice president; Herbert S. Houston, treasurer; William H. Short, secretary.]

NEW YORK, May 28, 1919.

Mr. EDMUND COOK,
Wilmot, S. Dak.

DEAR SIR: There is only one league of nations covenant now. It is the one incorporated in the peace treaty which Germany must sign.

Opponents must now show their true colors. The issue now is "The league or none." There is no other to be had.

The people want peace declared so things and conditions can be readjusted. They want Congress to ratify the peace treaty and get down to the business of settling some of our domestic problems that need attention. Every citizen who feels that way should speak out and say so.

If you agree with me, I wish to ask you to do three things:

1. Cooperate locally in getting county, city, or precinct machinery organized to hold ratification meetings.

2. Write a personal letter to both of your Senators—and get others to do likewise—saying you want the league of nations covenant promptly ratified.

3. Advise me that you are doing "1" and have done "2," and along with that letter of advice please send me the names of about 10 substantial citizens residing in various parts of your county.

Yours, for the cause,

W. R. BOYD, Jr.,
National Campaign Manager.

I think Senators will be interested in knowing what my constituent has to say in regard to this. On the margin of the letter, opposite the names of the executive committee, he writes as follows:

The response to this fervent appeal will not bring forth the usual flood of letters to our Senators, because the American people have become suspicious of beautiful rhetoric and "open covenants" camouflaged. The people should and will trust in good faith the United States Senate to preserve the traditions handed down by our preceptors—George Washington, Monroe, and Jackson.

I think probably in this connection he meant Jefferson, rather than Jackson.

Observe now, Mr. President, the peremptory tone of this letter, the finality, the ipse dixit nature of its statements: "There is only one league of nations covenant now." "The league or none." "There is no other to be had." It is as though the Senate of the United States must accept it as written and were without the power, or perhaps the capacity, to make amendments or reservations, however much desired, in order to safeguard the interests of the United States.

The League to Enforce Peace, or the writer of this letter, is right in saying the people want peace declared. He is far from right in the implication that they want it with the condition that it embrace also this only league of nations covenant.

Mr. President, it is true "the people want peace declared," but it is only a little while ago that the American people, as against a halting administration, demonstrated that they were overwhelmingly against a "peace at any price." The number of pacifists in the country, aside from those interned or in the penitentiary, was almost negligible. What was true then I believe to be true now. America was not beaten in this war. The valor and efficiency of her armies and the strength of her resources have demonstrated that it would have been impossible to defeat her in the contest of arms. She has no reason now on account of inferiority anywhere to demand peace at any price. True, she mourns the sacrifice of thousands of noble young lives and realizes in common with the rest of civilized mankind the horrors of modern warfare, especially when conducted as this was by our chief enemy, in utter disregard of international law and of the principles of humanity; still, neither through want of strength nor loss of men nor expenditure of money nor fear even of a repetition of some of the horrors of the late war, would her people be willing that she accept a peace at any price.

The hopes of the future of America rest in the spirit, the traditions, the great policies of her historic past. When the people of the United States become indifferent to the sovereign rights of the Nation, when they have no pride in our free, unhindered development along the line of American traditions and ideals, when they have lost faith in the precepts of the fathers of the Republic, and faith in our destiny is dead, then we are ready for a peace at any price—for a peace and a membership in a league of nations that may involve the loss of all the fine attributes and sentiments upon which we have relied and on which we have builded.

The letter which I have read from the League to Enforce Peace conveys no information as to the terms either of the peace treaty or the league. It carries the injunction that the person to whom it is written shall write a personal letter to both of his Senators and get others to do likewise, saying that he wants the league of nations covenant promptly ratified—this "only league." It assumes, of course, that the party is a lover of peace; that he and the tens of thousands of others to whom undoubtedly a like letter has been sent abhor war; that the American people are weary of war, weary of our own participation, though it was comparatively brief, weary of the tales of death and devastation resulting from the war, and that the weariness and the dread are so great and overwhelming that the average citizen, without inquiry, without enlightenment as to terms and meaning of this covenant for a league of nations and their effect upon our destiny or our mission, will, without further showing and without the change of a line, obey the mandate of the letter and demand of his Senators that they vote for the treaty as it is, regardless of the price.

Mr. President, if I ever had occasion to rejoice in the fact that the Senate of the United States may on the occasion of great tests like this be the custodian and guardian of the welfare of the people of the United States and the destiny of America, that time is now. All the unfair and uninforming and dictatorial propaganda which the League to Enforce Peace may disseminate will not prevail against it.

Let us not forget that the ambitious aims and vicious system which brought this war about were altogether unusual—abnormal. It is traceable to Prussianism as the great first cause. But Prussianism met its Waterloo in the days from Chateau-Thierry to Argonne Wood. And yet, as in some frenzy and fear of the hour, we lose sight of this and conduct ourselves as though it were a drawn battle, as though the doctrine that might makes right was still formidable and the evil geniuses of Neitsche and Bernhardi still imposed their vicious theories upon the German people through the will of a German Kaiser, or as though some other nation great in territory and formidable in resources might, notwithstanding the lessons of the war, be straightway imbued with the German spirit of conquest and aggrandizement. Nobody believes that any such menace can threaten the world for a generation at least. If it should, who doubts that America, under a like inspiration as that which so lately directed her, will again of her own accord, without the compulsion of a league of nations, come full armed to fight on the side of justice and liberty?

I mention these things not in the spirit of opposition to any league of nations but in answer to this demand for immediate, precipitate action which comes from outside, self-constituted proponents of a league to enforce peace, whose demand is that we vote to-day, ratify to-day, without waiting for a reservation or an amendment which will be accepted to-morrow.

Why debate the question? It is so much lost time. These zealous advocates, as will be seen from the very character of their propaganda, are largely responsible for any unrest that may exist concerning the ratification of this treaty and covenant. Their pronouncements are meant to leave the impression that economic chaos reigns, that war is imminent, and that a league of nations is our only hope and means of escape.

But, Mr. President, as for actual peace, we have it now, in America at least. Men pursue their wonted trades and occupations; the demobilization of our Army is proceeding with tremendous rapidity. The demand for labor, the conditions of business, do not require the returning soldier to wait for a job. The deserving man can find the job, and that, too, without the aid of an expensive Federal Employment Service. The wheels of our domestic commerce move as rapidly as a Government-controlled railroad system will let them move. Embargoes no longer prohibit our overseas trade, and the dangers of the deep are a thing of the past. There is a real freedom of the seas. The energies of every nation engaged in the late war, unless it be Bolshevist Russia or Austria-Hungary, are now, or very soon will be, devoted to the task of recuperation and rehabilitation.

It is to this class of importunate and impatient league propagandists, who imperatively demand immediate ratification, that we need to say, "Let us have peace."

Mr. President, we ought to know something of the complexity and of the possible magnitude of the undertaking of the United States under this covenant.

And, first, I think it safe to assume that the representatives of the three European powers and of the United States, who made and entered into the covenant, would never have considered that mutual guaranties of territory and of independence were necessary as between themselves. No one of these four powers sought such protection as against the aggressions of one or all the others. Neither Great Britain, France, nor Italy would dream of the United States as a source of military danger to themselves or their possessions, and the United States, most of all among the nations of the world, stands secure.

But apart from the confidence we have in the everlasting friendship of these three allies or associates in the Great War, no fear of any other nation or combination of other nations would have led us to propose the assumption of the obligations of article 10 of this covenant. The provisions in the covenant for the arbitration of disputes; the agreement not to resort to war until three months after the award of the arbitrators; the stipulations in regard to the reduction of armaments; the disposition of colonies and the selection and jurisdiction of mandatories might all, with others, have been agreed to and welcomed; but if the American people had been asked in advance if they were ready to guarantee the peace of the world and back their guaranty by making war upon any nation charged as an aggressor, in any part of the world, their answer would have been a universal "No." They would have said, as we must say, no man can tell what activities, what interventions, what armed forces, what expenditures of money, what sacrifice of men will be required in the years to come if we subscribe to article 10 of the covenant as it is written. They may be trifling enough. They may, on the other hand, tax our resources of men and of money to the utmost. Let a short 18 months of war, at a cost of $21,000,000,000, a burden of debt unprecedented in our history, a toll of dead of 112,000 American boys, to say nothing of the anguish, or of the thousands who will go through life maimed and disabled, tell their story of what the cost of war on a foreign soil is to the United States. But that was a cause worth while; our participation in it was in defense of American principles, inspired by American ideals. The glorious thing about it was that our participation was free and voluntary and not at the command of an alien council of a league of nations with power to determine when we shall fly to the aid of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State or Siam or Hejaz, or Persia, if she accepts the invitation extended to become a member of the league. For a like cause such as that we have just been engaged in defending on a magnitude and with a success which astonished the world, we will be ready to make like offering. But the assent of the American people is necessary to successful war, and that assent must be manifested not by one representative in an executive council of a league of nations sitting at Geneva but by all their Representatives here in Congress assembled and sworn to support the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, I repeat, the proposal to give the guaranties of article 10 could hardly have come in the first instance from the representatives of the United States. If they did, no expression on the part of the people or the people's representatives ever authorized them, but the proposal having been made, it should not be cause for wonder that since there was to be a league to enforce peace, the willingness of our representatives to assume the burden of so great a guaranty was gladly welcomed by the other nations most concerned.

Mr. President, our forefathers strove and warned against European entangling alliances. Until to-day we have heeded the warning. But the proposed reversal of this great policy does not stop with Europe. To know the full extent of the obligations we assume, the burdens we may have to bear, you must look at the map of the world. Of course, they welcomed our willingness, for had we not just demonstrated our promptness and efficiency in war? And do not our obligations extend to a guaranty of the territorial integrity and political independence against external aggression of the British Empire, which, in addition to the British Isles, means Canada, New Zealand, Australia, South Africa, India, and insular possessions innumerable? Of course, France welcomes our agreement to article 10, for in addition to the protection the agreement will afford against the invasion of her home territory by Germany or Austria, may not the French Congo, or Sierra Leone, or Algiers in Africa, or her empire in Indo-China in Asia be the subject of attack?

And is it cause for wonder that Italy, with her newly gained possessions in Europe, wrested by force of arms from Austria-Hungary, with her African possessions also to defend and protect, welcomes the guaranty of the United States? Mr. President, I think Clemenceau was right in insisting on the principle of the balance of power in Europe. Of course, there can be no "concert of Europe" now, and the next best thing, if not a better thing, for France than even the balance of power or "concert of Europe" was to put the resources of the United States at the command of the council of a league of nations which had determined we should make good the guaranties of article 10.

This is a part—and only a part—of the price we are to pay for our first real departure from the old landmarks, for our first diplomatic entanglement in foreign alliances, our first forgetfulness of America and the "passion of America," which has been "to live her own life according to her own principle," our first ambitious attempt to prescribe regulations for the government of the world.

But, Mr. President, gladly as our European allies or associates have welcomed the assent of the United States to article 10 of this covenant, they know our traditional policies, they know our adherence to the Monroe doctrine. It will be remembered that it was out of the Canning-Rush correspondence of 1823 that the Monroe doctrine was evolved. Great Britain then regarded the principle as in the interests of peace and of free institutions. She has recognized our reliance upon it and our right to invoke it ever since. France and Italy likewise are both familiar, through experience, with the principles of the doctrine, and all three know how, from the date of our independence, the avoidance of entangling alliances with European nations and of noninterference in European affairs have been cardinal principles of the foreign policy of the United States. They, I am sure, will appreciate the reasonableness of a reservation which will leave it to the Congress of the United States to determine when and where we should intervene in the affairs of any of the nations of the Eastern Hemisphere, or whether we shall interfere at all. I can not help but think that they will not only themselves acquiesce in such reservation, but will use their influence in procuring the speedy acquiescence of all other European members of the league.

Mr. President, we may grant that it was all conceived in the spirit of altruism; that the guaranties of article 10 on our part are in obedience to the principle noblesse oblige; still the undertaking is an improvident one, and greater than we dare. In addition to the States directly and incidentally mentioned, our obligation extends from the time ratifications are exchanged to these other countries of the Eastern Hemisphere: Liberia, Portugal, Poland, Roumania, Belgium, Greece, Czechoslovakia, Japan, China.

What a travesty on a "Grand Design" is suggested by these last two names!

In the same breath in which all these States, great and small, pledge themselves to protect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of their cosignatories they consent to the continued partition of China, to the economic and territorial control by Japan of China's oldest and most populous Province and, because of its religious and educational history and associations, extending through the centuries, her most revered Province. Wrested from China by Germany in the first place for a cause insignificant and disproportionate to the reparation obtained, Shantung should, under the course of events since and under the moral law, be to-day under the complete dominion and sovereignty of China. China was a neutral in the war when Kiaochow was captured and taken over by Japan. Under any circumstances she could by such seizure have acquired no greater interest than Germany, and Germany's interest was subject to extinguishment by war between China and Germany. China declared war and rendered most valuable aid to the Allies. I know—we all know—that meantime Japan had extorted from China the "21 demands" treaty of 1915. But it was not because of any wrong done to Japan by China, or to secure herself against any such wrong in the future, that Japan secured the concessions of 1915. They were aggrandizements pure and simple, granted by the representatives of a peaceable people, unprepared to resist the military force which would have been used by Japan had not her arrogant ultimatum been at once complied with.

What an anomaly! A great Province with a population of nearly 40,000,000, under threat of force, taken over from an unoffending nation—a Republic, too—to become the territory of the autocracy employing the duress, all in time for the protection afforded by the guaranties of article 10. But, after all, there is nothing in the article that relates specifically to making the "world safe for democracy," nothing which expressly confers the right of "the self-determination of peoples," though it was hoped the animating spirit of a league of nations, interwoven with the peace treaty, would be present to denounce and prevent, instead of perpetuating, this great international wrong. I have but this one question: Shall we, by ratifying this treaty as it is written, put ourselves in a position under which it can be required of us to defend by force of arms the possessor of the fruits of this or any other like wrong?

Mr. President, it is of interest to note how many of the States that have signed the covenant or that have been invited to become members of the league we are already under obligations to protect and defend. Thirty-one States, exclusive of the United States, are down as original members of the league of nations. This includes China, which, because of Shantung, refuses to sign the treaty. Of these 31 States 11, or more than one-third, come under the protection of the Monroe doctrine. They are Bolivia, Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, and Uruguay. Thirteen States have been invited to accede to the covenant. Of these 13, 6, or nearly one-half, come under the protection of the Monroe doctrine. They are Argentine Republic, Chile, Columbia, Paraguay, Salvador, Venezuela. Of a total of 44 States, exclusive of the United States, which are either members or have been invited to become members of the league, 17 States, or nearly 40 per cent, are States whose political independence and territorial integrity we have always stood ready to protect and defend against foreign aggression, and I am confident that such will be our attitude through the long years to come.

Heaven grant that we may never be called on to defend them by force of arms; but if we are, no treaty that we here ratify shall require the submission of that controversy to any league of nations under the sun. If there arises a controversy between any two of the Latin-American Republics themselves, I am satisfied that our good offices and the good offices of other friendly American nations will do more to prevent war and bring about a peaceable adjustment than will all the grave deliberations and decisions of an assembly or council constituted in the manner provided in this covenant.

Not now, Mr. President, but on another occasion I hope to be able to tell the story of the Monroe doctrine. I think the doctrine in its announcement and application has been more instrumental in preserving the peace of both hemispheres than any single governmental policy or action of which we have account. Not by word, not by lofty precept alone has our country wrought for peace and for democracy, but by experience and living example. Her very thorough, and yet sympathetic, critic said of her in his introductory chapter to the "American Commonwealth," speaking of the United States:

> They represent an experiment in the rule of the multitude, tried on a scale unprecedently vast, and the results of which everyone is concerned to watch. And yet they are something more than an experiment, for they are believed to disclose and display a type of institutions toward which, as by a law of fate, the rest of civilized mankind are forced to move, some with swifter, others with slower, but all with unresting feet.

Mr. President, my hope for my country is that she shall keep on that solid ground of American principles and ideals which alone could have earned such eloquent recognition of her mission to mankind.

FIUME AND THE ITALIAN FRONTIER.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice given previously I wish to discuss specifically the effect of the treaty on Italy, and particularly the port city of Fiume.

I again wish, however, to congratulate the Senate that in the spring of 1917 the rules were not so modified as to introduce into the practice of the Senate the parliamentary motion known as the previous question, thereby closing all discussion upon any subject pending here. If that had been adopted, at this time a vote could be forced by the administration, without discussion, upon the several vital subjects pending in this body; not only the league of nations but the peace treaty, the Franco-American treaty, the Polish treaty—about which there probably is not so much discussion—as well as one recently reported to the Senate by the Foreign Relations Committee, known as the Colombian treaty. A limited discussion, if any, would be imposed upon the Senate, and nothing but a series of roll calls would stand between those vital subjects and their incorporation, if they be of any validity whatever, in the laws and treaties of this country.

Colombia, since 1914, has had hopes of the ratification of a treaty negotiated between the proper diplomatic authorities of the United States and that country. It has reached a point, probably, where discussion and a vote will be had in this body in due time. Beginning with 1901, 1902, and 1903, when the matter first became acute relating to the acquisition of the Canal Zone, Colombia, since the establishment of the Panama Republic, has been of the opinion that she had been aggrieved by the action of this country, and that the only way in which there could be solace for her feelings would be the payment of $25,000,000 in gold. That is now pending on a report of the Foreign Relations Committee, and must sooner or later be discussed and disposed of. At the proper time I shall submit my views on that question.

I am irrevocably opposed to the ratification of the treaty, either in its original form, wherein it was a craven apology, or in its amended form, in which the apology is stricken out, and $25,000,000 are to be paid to that country for the conduct of our Government in relation to the establishment of Panama as a separate State. It is revived at this time, I presume, because there seems to be a wave of maudlin international drivel sweeping over the world. In that time it is presumed that we will forget that money is money and taxes are taxes, and that the relations of one nation to another are governed by the principles of ordinary common sense and decency. Our debauch, however, is drawing to an end. We have been fed on dreams and dwelt long in air castles. Phrase mongers have fired multitudes with catchwords and many war cries. A vast unrest disturbs many lands. Mediocrity and ignorance demand sway over skill and intelligence. The world is to be ruled hereafter by chance mitigated by violence. The less one knows the more he must be paid not to know it. The laws and qualities of our being and of nature and of economics are eternal in their operation, and, willing or unwilling, we must yield to their inevitable effect. Their grasp even now, Mr. President, is tightening on us.

On July 23, 1864, coming immediately to the rights and wrongs of Italy, President Lincoln wrote to the Italian envoy extraordinary a letter, which is as follows:

I am free to confess that the United States have in the course of the last three years encountered vicissitudes and been involved in controversies which have tried the friendship and even the forbearance of other nations, but at no stage in this unhappy fraternal war, in which we are only endeavoring to save and strengthen the foundation of our national unity, has the King or the people of Italy faltered in addressing to us the language of respect, confidence, and friendship.

I pray God to have your country in His holy keeping, and to vouchsafe to crown with success her noble aspirations to renew, under the auspices of her present enlightened Government, her ancient career, so wonderfully illustrated in the achievements of art, science, and freedom.

How have we kept faith with the spirit of Lincoln in dealing with our steadfast friend?

We have submitted to us a treaty of 430 sections providing for new boundary lines of the greater part of Europe involved in the war. These boundary lines have been traced by diplomats and by international authorities. It is needless to say that whether or not protestations have been made that this is to be a new era, in which relations are to be established upon entirely new and just principles, there begins to be manifest the same selfishness, the same desire to overreach, the same grasp for territory, to cultivate stronger commercial relations with countries that may be advantageous, and to put at a disadvantage those countries which may possibly be commercial rivals.

Thought is had, by looking at this treaty, to the possible future strength and development of even the nations that were associated with us in the war. There is the same desire for a balance of power to promote some nations and to weaken others; the same desire to build up buffer States, to create new countries that may draw from an enemy, that may give commercial ports of entry to some and to deny it to others.

Pursuant to that, the port city of Fiume has been denied to Italy. It is one of the northeastern ports. It is claimed that it is necessary to the new State of Slovakia or the Jugo-Slovak State created under the treaty and the peace league.

For the last 20 years—

Writes an Italian—

My fellow citizens and I have been fighting for the cause of the redemption of Fiume. During the war I was one of those put on trial for implacable irredentism. How I escaped the gallows only adds another to the list of unexplained miracles. Now, I have come to America to make the true voice of my city heard and to make it clear in my official capacity that Fiume craves to be united to Italy. Fiume is Italian by the blood that flows in her veins, the words of her mouth, and the burning desire of her heart!

Fiume has always fought against foreign oppression. She was a part of Hungary, but as a "separate body." Hungary was composed of three States—Hungary proper, Croatia, and Fiume. The victory of the Italian Army severed this union and Fiume regained her independence. On the 30th of October, 1918, four days before Austria signed the armistice, Fiume unanimously declared her union with Italy, thus repeating her own history.

This is an article from the Journal of American History, on page 72, which I desire to print in full in my remarks without further reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

For in 1779 she fought against the proposed annexation of Croatia, and in 1868 obtained recognition of her peculiar position as a free and independent city, united to Hungary in a temporary way, but a State in herself.

In so far as her self-determination is concerned, she counts on the sympathetic encouragement of America. In Fiume all the mayors, all the deputies, the members of the municipal council, of the chamber of commerce, and of the courts have always been Italian. This being the case, they think themselves free to dispose of their own fate, and who can deny them the right of joining their mother country?

We hear people say that if Fiume is united to Italy the populations of the interior will not have an outlet to the sea. This is not true. Jugo-Slavia has excellent natural harbors between Buccari and Carlopago. It is not at all necessary to sacrifice the purely Italian character of Fiume in order to give an outlet to the interior. It is interesting to recall that before the war the commerce of Croatia at Fiume was only 7 per cent of the total commercial output, the rest of the traffic belonging to Hungary. We are not enemies of the Jugo-Slavs, unless they invade our territory. Near Fiume they have the beautiful city of Susak, which they may easily and naturally develop and enlarge. If we can each live within our own boundaries, peace and friendship will naturally follow.

The mayor, the president of the national council, and the deputy of Fiume to the Hungarian Parliament were received in Paris by President Wilson, to whom the situation was clearly explained and the justice of our national aspirations demonstrated. President Wilson and the American delegates expressed themselves as profoundly impressed with their significance; it was even triumphantly reported that the silent Col. House lifted his voice in their favor.

Fiume has a population of 35,000 native Italians. This population rules its own city, and the will of the citizens of Fiume must be seriously considered. We want to be Italians and Italy wants us to be Italians. We are like brothers who are at last reunited after centuries of suffering and struggles.

Mr. SHERMAN. I next read from a book known as Italy's Great War, published in Milan, Italy, in 1914. I read such parts as are material from pages 155, 156, and 157:

Everything we know of the ancient history of Fiume proves the determination of her citizens to remain Italian, a determination which is confirmed by their recent history.

Then, on those pages, after reciting in very brief form the early history and traditions, showing the city to be thoroughly Italian in blood, language, and traditions, it shows the effort made to destroy the Italian tendency.

The rest of these extracts on pages 155, 156, and 157 I desire to have printed, without reading, in order to save time.

The matter referred to is as follows:

When, in August, 1848, the Croatians, who had joined forces with the Austrians against revolutionary Hungary, took military possession of the city of Fiume, their leader, a certain Bunjevac, the representative of the Ban of Croatia, recognizing the nationality of the inhabitants, promised to respect the city's municipal liberties and the use of the Italian language. The people of Fiume, however, knowing that they could not trust the promises of the invader, resisted by every means in their power, nor could their spirit be broken by 19 years of continual oppression. Persecution, imprisonment, bloody measures of repression could not put an end to the repeated protests of the municipality against "any and every annexation to Croatia." Failing to overcome the resistance of the representatives of the people, the Croatian governor tried to influence the people themselves. He drew up a list of electors and invited the citizens to elect deputies to represent them at the Diet of Zagabia. Eight hundred and seventy people voted, and 840 voting papers bore the two words "No one." The attempt was renewed, with a like result, while on a third occasion three-quarters of the electors wrote under the names of the proposed deputies the direction, "Let them protest against any and every annexation to Croatia."

When the Hungarians, who succeeded the Croatians in 1867 and were hailed as liberators, began to make attempts on the national character of Fiume they met with an equally sturdy resistance. It was useless to try to wipe out 20 centuries of Latin civilization in a few years, and the attempt was doomed to failure from the beginning. The Hungarian Government tried to attain its end by colonization. They began by installing a regular army of bureaucrats; the postal and telegraphic services, the customs and tax offices, schools, railways, public works, and banks were all crowded with Hungarian officials. The Government thus created an electorate which could be trusted to obey. This, however, did not suffice. The struggles of daily life only served to strengthen the conscience of the Italians, whose commerce and industries served as so many weapons of defense. The Government then determined to turn its attention to the realm of intellect by making the higher schools thoroughly Hungarian and refusing admission to these schools to all who were not ready to renounce their own nationality and by making the study of the Hungarian language compulsory and appointing Magyars to teach Italian, with the object of corrupting and debasing the language. They also attacked the Italians in the economic field by setting up unfair competition, reducing their profits by means of legal trickery, depriving them of all power of initiative, and opening banks and shops which drained away the economic lifeblood of the "rebels." The Government even went so far as to make its police organize faked dynamite plots, so as to have a pretext for imprisoning those citizens who were the stanchest opponents of its system.

These maneuvers, too, were fruitless. Although the Government so manipulated the list of municipal electors that in 1914 the 6,000 Hungarians who had settled at Fiume during the last years disposed of 1,100 votes, while the other 44,000 inhabitants only had 1,200, the municipality yet contrived to remain Italian.

We see, then, that we have no need of new plebiscites to ascertain the will of the people of Fiume. History, both ancient and modern, shows clearly that Fiume has always desired to be Italian, a desire which is stronger than ever to-day, and she is determined that her sons who left their homes that they might not be forced to serve in the ranks of their oppressors and lost their lives fighting in the ranks of the Italian Army for right and justice and the deliverance of their people shall not have died in vain.

* * * * * * *

The Czech countries are about 7 kilometers from Fiume, and could only be connected with it by means of a passage crossing Austria or Hungary from north to south; a similar passage, though somewhat shorter, would be necessary in order to connect Austria and Hungary with Fiume, the former passage crossing Carniola, the latter Croatia. Such a plan is, however, hardly likely to be taken into serious consideration. The only remaining country which could be placed in direct communication with Fiume is Croatia.

As we have already remarked, we can think of Croatia either as an independent State or as joined to Serbia. In the former case we should have a State numbering at most 3,000,000 inhabitants and possessing very little industry or commerce. Croatia contributed only 4 per cent of the total import and export trade passing through the port of Fiume. How, then, can Croatia lay claim to a great port like Fiume on the ground of necessity or urge that the principle of nationality must be set aside in order to provide her with such a port?

Mr. SHERMAN. I read also from an article by Hazleton on "Fiume, the Italian City," page 13:

The free ports of Fiume and Trieste continued to flourish at the expense of Germany, Bohemia, southern Bavaria, Tyrol, Styria, Carniola, and the other Provinces of Austria diverted their commerce toward the Adriatic, because Trieste and Fiume have about the same relation to the valley of the Danube that Hamburg and Rotterdam have to the valley of the Rhine. Germany, which did not wish or was not able to meet the competition of Trieste and Fiume, compelled Austria-Hungary to abolish the two free ports in the Adriatic. Thus Hungary, bowing to the commercial supremacy of Germany, took away the free port in 1891 and established in its place the so-called free point.

Mr. President, to show the condition in which Fiume is left, what a danger point it is, and what a source of future political and military explosion, I now read from an article in the London Herald, dated May 24, 1919. I wish to say that the copy of the London Herald I now hold in my hand was sent to me by some unknown friend from London. The London Star, of April 14, 1919, containing a purported interview and some account of the activities of W. B. Colver, was wrapped up in the same wrapper and came to my office. I opened them and have both papers. I now read from one of the papers an article of W. N. Ewer, dated Paris, Friday, May 23:

PARIS (Friday).

The news of the resignations of the staff of the American peace delegation has naturally caused a considerable sensation here. Every effort is being made to discount the importance of it. Statements are being made in the press that the whole matter is greatly exaggerated, and that no resignations have taken place because of dissatisfaction with the treaty.

As a matter of fact, my previous message, if anything, understated the position. I have to-day to report still another important resignation. Mr. Williams, the chief expert adviser on Far Eastern affairs, who has been for years chief of the Far Eastern section of the Department of State, has gone because the Shantung settlement was made over his head and against his views.

As regards Messrs. Young and Bowman, the press statements that they have not resigned, but have merely gone home to report, are simply untrue. They have, as I announced, resigned, and their resignations were definitely on the ground that their advice had been ignored on the territorial and economic terms of the treaty, and that they entirely disapprove of its actual terms.

Mr. Williams was appointed Chief of the Division of Far Eastern Affairs on December 31, 1913. He resigned September 1, 1918, and took his place as professor of oriental languages. When the peace commission sailed from our shores, he attended that commission to Paris, where he discharged the duties incident to his position until his resignation, referred to in Mr. Ewer's article. This article in the London Herald continues:

The most foolish stories have been circulated about William Bullitt's resignation, to which the best reply is the actual text of his letter of resignation to President Wilson, which he now authorizes me to publish.

Mr. Bullitt was one of the commissioners named by our President to attend a meeting with the representatives of the Bolshevist government. He was one of three representing this Government. The other two were Lincoln Steffens and George D. Herron. Mr. Bullitt, after considerable had been said in the public press about his resignation, gave to Mr. Ewer at Paris a copy of his letter, which Mr. Ewer cabled to his paper in London. It runs as follows:

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have submitted to-day to the Secretary of State my resignation as assistant of the Department of State attached to the American commission to negotiate peace. I was one of the millions who trusted confidently and implicitly your leadership and believed you would take nothing less than a permanent peace based upon "unselfish and unbiased justice."

But our Government has consented now to deliver the suffering peoples of the world to new oppressions, subjections, and dismemberments—a new century of war.

And I can convince myself no longer that effective labor for "a new world order" is possible as a servant of this Government.

Russia—the acid test of good will for me as for you—has not even been understood. The unjust decisions of the conference in regard to Shantung, the Tyrol, Thrace, Hungary, East Prussia, Danzig, and Saar Valley and the abandonment of the principle of the freedom of the seas make new international conflicts certain.

It is my conviction that the present league of nations will be powerless to prevent these wars and that the United State will be involved in them by obligations undertaken in the covenant of the league and the special understanding with France.

Therefore the duty of the Government of the United States to its own people and to mankind is to refuse to sign or ratify this unjust treaty, to refuse to guarantee its settlements by entering the league of nations, to refuse to entangle the United States further by an understanding with France.

That you are personally opposed to most of the unjust settlements and that you accepted them only under great pressure is well known. Nevertheless, it is my conviction that if you had made your fight in the open instead of behind closed doors, you would have carried with you the public opinion of the world, which was yours. You would have been able to resist the pressure and might have established that "new international order based upon broad and universal principles of right and justice" of which you used to speak.

I am sorry you did not fight our fight to a finish, and that you had so little faith in the millions of men like myself, in every nation, who had faith in you.

Very sincerely, yours, WILLIAM C. BULLITT.

This reflects in some degree the danger spots attendant upon the league of nations and the peace treaty, of which Fiume is but one.

The London Globe on April 26 contained the following caustic comment upon these transactions:

What might have been expected from the way in which affairs have been conducted in Paris has at length come to pass. The futile and impossible league of nations and the 14 points have formed the foundation of the discussions and now their instability is being amply demonstrated in several directions. Instead of concluding a drastic and enduring peace, Mr. Wilson and our delegates, who seem to have been as wax in his hands, have busied themselves with dreams of the millenium, and these have proven themselves of such stuff as dreams are made of. Now, they have struck a nasty snag in Fiume, and they are brought up suddenly against realities. The awakening is not pleasant, and Mr. Wilson betrays his realization of the fact by a wildly insolent attempt to go behind the Italian delegates to the Italian people. This is presumptuousness run mad.

Again, from the London Standard of the same date another article of a like tenor is noted. This I will not read, but ask that it be printed in my remarks without such reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the London Standard.]

Obviously, if the future is so uncertain, the instinct of self-preservation must come into conflict with Wilsonian idealism. We in England know with what feelings we received the suggestion that the British Navy should abdicate its functions. The French feelings, with regard to the eastern defensive frontier, and Italian feelings, with regard to the Adriatic, are of a precisely similar character. The league of nations can only succeed if it is based on the confidence of the victorious European powers, and, to speak quite frankly, that confidence can only be gained in one way—by the United States giving absolute guaranties of the willingness to support at any time by force of arms the decisions of the league.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, Fiume is the principal seaport in the northeastern Adriatic. It is of infinite consequence, both as a matter of defense or of conquest by her enemies, in the future. I have condensed much that can be said on this subject from many documents that are accessible.

In 1914 it did not appear Italy was so situated as to be induced to enter the war against Germany. Germany had fortified herself by secret treaties and intrigue until the Central Powers regarded themselves safe on their Italian frontier. The Italian Government in 1914 was averse to entering the war. Public sentiment in 1915 virtually drove a neutral Government from power. It is possible that to call it a neutral Government understates the case. Strong evidence exists that some, at least, of the dominant officials were pro-German. At least sufficient influence could be exerted by that Government to keep Italy neutral and relieve the Austro-Hungarian frontier of the need of an army on that border. In 1915 the neutral officials were ousted and Italy entered the war with the allied and associated powers against Germany and Austria.

When Italy cast her strength into the war against the Central Powers it was a vital decision. Five million Italian soldiers created a battle line from the Alps to the sea; 500,000 dead and 1,000,000 wounded with $13,000,000,000 expenditure testify to the greatness of the Italian sacrifice. The battle line on the Austrian frontier reacted on the German advance in eastern France from Lorraine to the English Channel. Germany was compelled to withdraw soldiers, artillery, and war supplies to strengthen Austria in her struggle against the new enemy on her southern flank. A neutral Italy would have left the dual empire free to send its military forces to strengthen Germany and enable the latter power to concentrate instead of compelled to divide her forces in the drive toward Paris and the channel ports. Italy's casting her lot, therefore, with the allied powers marks a decisive event in the fortunes of war. It ranks with the entry of the United States in the Great War against the Central Powers.

Italy sat at the peace table knowing that she merited recognition commensurate with her sacrifice. Prior to her entering the war in 1915 a treaty was concluded, dated April 26 of that year, with Great Britain, France, and Russia. Under its terms the peace treaty entitled Italy to receive the district of Trentino, the entire southern Tyrol to its natural geographic boundary, the River Brenner, the city and suburbs of Trieste, Goritzia, and Drabisca, all of Istria to Quarnero, including Volosca and the Istrian islands of Cherso and Lussino, and also the smaller islands of Plavnik, Unia, Canidole, Palazzuolo, San Pietro dei Nembi, Azinello, and Grutzo, together with the neighboring islands.

Mr. President, I wish to insert in the RECORD, without reading, articles 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 of what is known as the London pact or treaty of 1917.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted.

The articles referred to are as follows:

ART. 4. Under the imminent treaty of peace Italy must receive: The district of Trentino; the entire southern Tyrol to its natural geographic boundary, the River Brenner; the city and suburbs of Trieste, Goritzia, and Gradisca, all of Istria to Quarnero, including Volosca, and the Istrian islands of Cherso and Lussino, and also the smaller islands of Plavnik, Unia, Canidole, Palazzuolo, San Pietro dei Nembi, Azinello, Grutzo, together with the neighboring islands.

ART. 5. In the same manner Italy is to receive the Province of Dalmatia in its present form, with the inclusion within its limits on the north of Lissariki and Trebino, and on the south of all lands to a line drawn at Cape Planca to the east along the watershed in such a manner that in the Italian domains shall be included all the valleys along the rivers flowing into Sebiniko, such as Chicollo, Kerka, and Butisnitza, with all their tributaries. In the same way Italy is to receive all the islands located to the north and west of the shores of Dalmatia, beginning with the islands of Premua, Selva, Ulbo, Skerd, Maoñ, Pago, and Puntadura, and farther to the north, and to Meled on the south, with inclusion therein of the islands of St. Andrew, Buzzi, Lissa, Lessino, Tercola, Curzola, Kaisa, and Lagosta, with all the islands and bluffs belonging to them, as well as Palagozza, but without the islands of great and little Zirona, Bua, Satti, Brazza.

ART. 6. Italy shall receive in full right Vallon, the islands of Sasseno, and a territory sufficiently extensive to safeguard them in a military way, approximately between the River Voyuss on the north and the east, and to the boundaries of the Schimar district to the south.

ART. 7. On receiving Trentino and Istria in accordance with article 4, of Dalmatia and the Adriatic Islands in accordance with article 5, and the Bay of Vallon, Italy is obligated in the event of the formation in Albania of a small autonomous neutralized State, not to oppose the possible desire of France, Great Britain, and Russia to redistribute among Montenegro, Serbia, and Greece of the northern and southern districts of Albania. The southern shore of Albania from the boundary of the Italian district of Vallona to the Cape of Stilos is subject to neutralization.

Italy shall have the right to conduct the foreign relations of "Albania." In any event, Italy obligates herself to leave certain territory sufficiently extensive for Albania, in order that the boundaries of the latter are contiguous on the west from Lake Ochrida to the boundaries of Greece and Serbia.

ART. 8. Italy is to receive in full right all the islands now occupied by her at Dodekez.

ART. 9. France, Great Britain, and Russia in principle recognize the interests of Italy in preserving the political balance in the Mediterranean Sea, and her right to receive on the division of Turkey an equal share with them in the basin of the Mediterranean, and more specifically in that part of it contiguous to the Province of Adalia, where Italy had already obtained special rights and has developed certain interests vouchsafed to her by the Italo-British agreement. The zone subject to transfer to the sovereignty of Italy will be more specifically defined in due time, and in correspondence with the vital interests of France and Great Britain. Likewise the interests of Italy must be taken into consideration, even in the event the territorial inviolability of Asiatic Turkey shall be sustained by the powers for a further period of time, and if only redistribution of spheres of influence is to take place. Should France, Great Britain, and Russia in the course of the present war occupy certain districts of Asiatic Turkey, the entire district adjacent to Adalia, and herewith more specifically defined, shall remain with Italy, which reserves for itself the right to occupy the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certain other provisions, which I shall not insert in the RECORD, provide for compensating territorial advantages in Libya, Arabia, and Africa. They secured the Italian frontier. Article 16 requires the treaty to be kept secret.

Undoubtedly this treaty was the controlling powerful inducement for Italy to declare war. It is now criticized because all secret treaties are supposed to have fallen under the ban. Russia in her present domestic condition is no longer a factor in the present peace. Great Britain and France, however, sat at the Paris conference with Italy's representative. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that those two powers hailed the advent of President Wilson, breathing lofty international moralities and clad in the glittering armor of his defunct 14 points, as a means of escaping a diplomatic embarrassment.

Our President had denounced and still denounces secret treaties. That denunciation is continued in the league of nations. I share in the dislike of such diplomacy in the future relations of civilized powers; but I can not reach that ultra level of morality that condemns a secret treaty, after having received its benefits and permitting the beneficiary to retain all the advantages and repudiate the promise, unless there is something essentially unjust against the laws of civilized nations or exhibiting moral turpitude. At the time of the London Pact in 1915, on the contrary, I find nothing so to condemn the vital articles of the treaty. At that time and for many years Germany had by intrigue, secret treaties, and clandestine communication with various powers sought to rivet her control not only on Europe but had entertained dreams of world conquest. Germany's foreign intrigues were conducted with profound secrecy. They had instigated racial and class warfare in countries they could not bring under their sway. Sedition and rebellion were familiar instruments in their hands to break down unfriendly nations. Germany's sole purpose is now well known to have been a long, covert, sinister preparation not only by military force but by scandalous treaties and intrigue before the war began in 1914. There is no diplomatic immorality in combating Germany with secret treaties. Great Britain, France, and Russia were justified in making with Italy the secret treaty of 1915. It is hypermorality to insist that Germany's self-created enemies must observe the rules of open diplomacy and tread the narrow and elevated path of the new international code, leaving Germany free to intrigue, rob, and destroy in whatever manner she pleases. I believe in fighting his satanic majesty with such diabolic instruments as will remove the menace presented.

The London Pact must be tested by the character and conduct of the enemy and the circumstances of the struggle. I believe the rules of warfare, the laws of international morality, and a common humanity justify gathering strength against such a public enemy even by using some of Germany's methods. In these circumstances the London treaty of 1915 was made. It gained for the Allies the Italian Nation. It was not merely Italy's military and naval strength she cast into the scale against Germany. I repeat, it was the creation of a battle line on Austria's southern flank, which drew from the eastern front in France strength then vital to German success. The morale of the Allies was strengthened beyond the estimate.

In the foregoing situation President Wilson condemned the London Pact and denied the duty of Great Britain and France under its provisions to give Italy her frontiers guaranteed in that treaty and declaimed generally against the iniquity of secret treaties.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator whether Fiume was included in that secret pact?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it was not.

Mr. THOMAS. That was my understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is right. I will come to that in a moment. It was a part of Hungary at the time the war broke out and up to the present and until the treaty of peace has been concluded and other disposition made of it.

If our President had not injected himself and the United States Government into the conference against the treaty, Italy would have received the guaranteed boundaries and territories for which she has performed a full service. There is no moral turpitude nor essential wrong in giving Italy the entire benefit promised in the treaty.

The ninth of President Wilson's points in his address to Congress on January 8, 1918, declares:

A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality.

It is possible that when the President delivered this message he did not know of the London treaty of 1915, affecting Italy's frontier. Let that be assumed, although I doubt whether he lacked such knowledge. It was generally understood as early as 1916 that such a treaty existed and was the prevailing motive that carried Italy into the war for the Allies. This one of the 14 points is lamentably executed. Another idealism wrecked. I am in accord with the invalidity of secret treaties applied to future transactions, but I can not arouse my indignation over secret treaties which were vital steps in overcoming a treacherous public enemy, whose methods were without restraint either by common humanity or by any known rule of diplomacy or civilized warfare. I find it impossible to attain the sublime moral frenzy into which our President works himself when entranced by his ethereal phrases adapted only to the high altitude of the politically sanctified. I believe Italy is entitled to the full measure promised her in the 1915 treaty.

In the absence of such benefits Italy's claims at the hands of her allies have not been equitably met. Disappointment and ingratitude are the lot of Italy at Paris in return for her great sacrifice. President Wilson is responsible for Italy's exclusion from the fruits of victory. She lies on the tidewater of the Mediterranean, with the Adriatic Sea extending along her eastern and northern border. Within her boundaries and beyond in other countries are the Alps. In that mighty chain of mountains to her east and northeast are the ancient and historic passes through which Asiatic and eastern invaders have for thousands of years poured their warlike hordes on the frontiers of western Europe. The Alps are nature's defenses. The passes are the natural gateways and are supremely vital to the defenses of Italy. Through these passes came the great Slavic invasions in the fourth and fifth centuries. Their silent wails, if their stony lips could speak, would tell when Attila, the scourge of God, marched with his legions to subjugate western Europe and destroy Christendom. They would record the invasion of the Ostrogoths under Theodoric, when the flood of Asiatic barbarism again poured over western Europe. These silent witnesses saw the great Hun invasion in 943 A. D. Italy's defenses can not be safe by merely making the shore line of the Adriatic her northeastern and southeastern boundaries. It would compel her to maintain a navy at tremendous expense far beyond what ought to be imposed upon her.

All the great Alpine basin, whose waters flow into the Adriatic Sea, is Italian territory. Those mountain heights and valleys, reared by the Omnipotent in imperishable majesty and beauty, are Italy's. The hand of God traced her everlasting boundary lines in the snow-crowned peaks and sunlit swiftly-flowing rivers that fall into the great Italian sea.

Along the eastern shore of the Adriatic is a narrow belt of coast land about 210 miles long and from 1 mile to 35 miles wide. This zone of fairly level plain is bounded on the east by the Dinaric Alps, an almost continuous precipitous wall of rugged mountains, rising in places in cliffs 6,000 feet above the sea level. This mountain chain is Italy's eastern defense. The Adriatic, unless fortified and manned by a formidable navy, is the facile highway for attack. The nation that owns or controls the plain between the Alps and the Adriatic commands, when fortified, Italy's Adriatic boundary. It is a perpetual menace. Dalmatia is of consequence in the future of Italy. Passing north along the shore line the Istrian Peninsula suggests the port city of Fiume, the storm center of controversy at the peace conference.

Anciently Fiume was a part of Venice. In the age of that city's commercial glory, when she commanded respect by her wealth and power, Fiume dwelt in the overflow of her plenty and magnificence. She continued Italian until the Corsican, wielding the military strength of France, became the dispenser of thrones and gave territory to his military allies. Napoleon delivered Fiume with certain adjacent country to Austria. It remained a possession of the dual empire until Austria-Hungary toppled with Wilhelm II to defeat. When the London treaty of 1915 was concluded the dissolution of the Austro-Hungarian Empire was not foreseen. The results of such a division of territory were not undertaken to be anticipated. Fiume was a part of Hungary. It therefore, with the change in spirit and effect, has become a part of Italy's guaranteed frontier if she is to be protected on her Adriatic boundary as France is to be guaranteed against German aggression by the provisions of the treaty respecting the Rhine and the limitation on fortified posts. If France is given Alsace-Lorraine, Italy ought to have restored to her her Italia irredenta and be given Fiume, as her people ask.

Anciently Hungary was composed—down to the time of this treaty—of Hungary proper, of Croatia, of Fiume, and the adjacent district appurtenant to and subject to the free city of the earlier days of Fiume. Various smaller countries, including Croatia-Slavonia, are created into the Jugo-Slovakia State. If there is anything in self-determination, the city of Fiume, 75 per cent Italian, belongs to Italy and ought by simple justice alone to have been given her by the treaty agreed upon at the Paris conference.

The various racial and political elements of the Jugo-Slavic government can not be fused into a homogeneous unit by a mere decree of the Paris conference. No covenant of the league of nations will obliterate the ancient feuds that have divided and reddened the Danube Provinces from Belgrade to Salonika. Tranquillity on Italy's Adriatic border, she knows full well, is not secured by the league of nations fiat. Italy takes counsel of human experiences. Her history reaches through many centuries. Her experiences with the nations of Europe abundantly justify her in asking adequate security for her boundary lines now. Since 1915 she can not forget that Croatian soldiers under Austrian colors fought Italian troops savagely. The Croatian forces carried spiked war clubs that would have done honor to a native of equatorial Africa or a Modoc Indian in North America. Italy knows the character of her eastern Danube Province neighbors. She believes in the peace league, as we do, and in adequate guaranties, as France believes, as evidenced by the treaty now pending in this Chamber, that will convince some of the restless population constituting the Jugo-Slav State and the Germans of future days that Italy possesses strength out of which a defense can be made. She has no faith that the Jugo-Slav State is so constituted that Italy will be well able to defend her frontiers unless the security claimed is given.

Fiume is the port city of the northeastern Adriatic. It is the converging point for the trade of the eastern interior. Its prospects for commercial importance are encouraging, and, with the blessings of peace, it will gather to itself commercial strength. The city is Italian in blood, language, and tradition. Italia irredenta from the Trentino to the south shore of Dalmatia is at least 65 per cent Italian by the ordinary tests applied in race analyses. Fiume in December, 1918, had a total population of 46,264, with 35,000 Italians. The vote of its people praying for union with Italy, taken October 30, 1918, less than two weeks before the armistice was signed, declared by an emphatic majority for that amalgamation. Self-determination, which has been a favorite solution of the problem on the lips of others, is invoked by Italy in vain. President Wilson turned a deaf ear to Italy, and Great Britain and France, somewhat relieved to have our Government assume responsibility, silently acquiesced. I should like to have seen Lloyd-George's face when he acquiesced or allowed it to pass unchallenged. I believe if he could have been observed, the honest Welshman would have been seen to blush.

Therefore Italy is told she can not profit by secret treaties for which she has paid the price in blood and a supreme good faith in keeping Italian national honor. She loses a commercial port and a naval base by a single stroke of the Wilson pen. Her northeastern defenses against future enemies are untenable under the settlement made by the Paris conference. A few days ago Croatia rebelled against her status in the new government. She demanded independence. The revolt was quelled, it is true, but its population is restless. There is no guaranty to Italy of stable conditions on her northeastern Adriatic shore, with Fiume in other hands.

The swiftly marching logic of events, Mr. President, is too fast even for our changing President. Haiti is in a state of chronic domestic insurrection; a revolution occurred in Peru on the 4th of July, as I have indicated in remarks previously made in this Chamber; Croatia rebelled and demanded independence from the Jugo-Slovak Government that she claimed was riveted upon her by the peace treaty. Colombia is now demanding $25,000,000 for her good offices if she is to remain friendly. I note that she is one of the 13 invited nations; and now, before the peace treaty is concluded or the league of nations ratified, is demanding that settlement be made. She is prudent as well as thrifty; she believes in collecting in advance; and so far as her good offices are concerned, they are strictly C. O. D.

The new Jugo-Slav Republic is an experiment. More than the ordinary uncertainty attending the launching of a new State inheres in the undertaking. The population included in the limits of this new State are not homogeneous. They are of diverse racial origin, language, religion, and ideals. While generally of the Caucasian race, there is a decided strain of Turkish blood in some of the people of this newly created State. There is another equally perceptible strain of Mongolian origin. Nowhere in all Europe can there be found such mingled strains of blood or such a hybrid population as here is sought to be welded into this new State. Their language is not alike; many dialects of the same language are spoken, and more strains of blood can be found in the population of the proposed new State than in any other population sought to be united under the flag of a single government.

The attempt to fuse such a polyglot people into a self-governing State is characteristic of the indifference exhibited in the league of nations for actual as against idealistic conditions. It is a magazine charged with all the elements of potential explosion. A large portion of its people are accustomed to an unsettled life consequent upon unstable surroundings in the frequent local wars which have prevailed there and devastated their country for many years. That element is not disposed to the tranquillity of private occupation. They are more or less inured to violence, and are of nomadic habits. The foundation for stable government is not there, and the prospects are not reassuring. Italy can not be criticized for wishing a strong frontier against such a restless neighbor, whose presence upon the Adriatic border of Italy practically constitutes another Mexico—and we all know what Mexico on our own border means.

Fiume is not the natural seaport for the larger part of this region. The cities east and southeast, more than a dozen in number, with over 500 miles of coast line, give access to the sea. Among these ports are Spalato and Cattaro. Both these ports are reached by railway connecting with Bosnia, Herzegovina, Slavonia, Serbia, and the hinterland. It is claimed this region of the Jugo-Slav State requires Fiume for the passage of its commerce. The groundlessness of this contention is exposed by showing that only 13 per cent of the imports and exports passed through Fiume before the war, while Croatia, the adjacent Province to Fiume, sent only 7 per cent of her entire imports and exports through this entrance to the Adriatic.

Fiume has been a separate body politic, annexed, however, to the Hungarian Crown. It has not been a part of Croatia. The Hungarian Parliament in 1868 declared the right of Fiume, the city, the harbor, and the district to be such. Croatia on November 16, 1868, by its Diet, after full debate, accepted the Hungarian law, declaring Fiume a separate municipality or district by an almost unanimous vote. That vote has never been repealed or otherwise reversed.

It seems idle for Croatia and her Jugo-Slav associates now to set up claims to the city. Fiume is not only traditionally Italian, but her blood, customs, and soil have been Italian in act or spirit for centuries. While annexed to Hungary it was an artificial union, brought about by military force, which has never extirpated the Italian character. Therefore Italy is justified, when the Austro-Hungarian artificial jurisdiction founded upon force is destroyed as a result of the war, in asking to resume the natural relations subsisting between Fiume and the mother country.

Shantung is given Japan pursuant to a secret treaty exacted by the latter power in 1917 and notes of 1915 and 1918. It was the price of Japan's permission to China to declare war with the Allies and a part also of the price of Japan's nominal participation in the war. Japan's sacrifices are unworthy of mention with those of Italy. She watched the progress of the great war with an eye somewhat single to her own advantage. Her military forces fought the German in Shantung to seize the proceeds of Germany's robbery of China. Neither international law nor the new code of international morals based on the condemnation of secret treaties can justify the plunder of China. The league of nations and the peace treaty will be condemned by the impartial historian for the sanction of this flagrant crime. President Wilson brands his denunciation of secret treaties with insincerity when he refuses Fiume to Italy, after her heroic sacrifices, and in obedience to secret treaties delivers Shantung to Japan, despite her course of studied selfishness in the Great War.

I fail to understand, Mr. President, why in the case of Japan a secret treaty is sanctified, while in the case of Italy it is condemned. I can explain it in no other way than by saying that Japan has become the Prussian of the Orient, and it was desired to placate her at the peace conference.

Italy is awakening to new life. She begins to show a resurrection of her mighty powers manifested through the centuries. Her Mediterranean and Adriatic ports are adapted to be gateways for an extensive commerce. With the danger of the dual empire and restless provinces on the east removed, she can again develop into a large factor in Europe. With the common peril to the Allies removed, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that Great Britain watches with jealous eye the chance of every European nation to divide her supremacy in foreign trade and merchant shipping. When the piping days of peace return, Great Britain, as of old, will look after her own affairs to the exclusion of all other countries.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOSES. In that connection, I should like to ask the Senator if he intends to touch upon the situation which exists in the port of Fiume, where the great Cunard Steamship Line has already been established for several years, and where it is likely, if the port should pass into the hands of Italy, that those natural sailors, the Italian race, would give British shipping a close contest; whereas if Fiume remained, as is now proposed, in the hands of a new and small and weak and undeveloped nation, the Cunard Line, flying the British flag, would not be interfered with in its operations in Fiume.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. I had not intended to comment upon this phase of the question, although it is a very material one for future discussion.

With Fiume handed over to the league of nations as a mandatory trust to be administered by four or five out of the nine on the council, or in the hands of a weaker nation with no foreign commerce, and especially under the provisions of the treaty, Great Britain's influence in that port will be paramount. That is a part of her far-seeing policy. If I were an Englishman I would not criticize it, but as an American I do. I believe it to be part of her coming struggle to control the merchant shipping and the foreign commerce of Europe, as she has done for many centuries. Her people, she being at home an island empire, are a sea-faring people. The flag of her merchant shipping goes to the ports of every country. Both her regular lines of shipping and her tramp steamers are found wherever there is a commerce to gather. Following her well-known disposition therefore to take care of her commerce, to gather into her treasury and into her markets all that there is in Europe and in the Far East, she looks with an eye single to her own advantage upon the placing of Fiume in the hands of the league of nations to be administered under four-year limitations, with a vague promise that some time in the future it will be returned to Italy. As the Senator from New Hampshire suggests, with Italy in control, with Fiume an Italian port, Italy would have the advantage and not the British Empire; and this is where we, acting under the lead of our President, are expected to pull the British chestnuts out of the commercial fire of the future.

I again thank the Senator for the suggestion, as it is a very pertinent one in this connection, and I wish I had time not only to investigate it but to comment upon it at some length.

Italy is practically ignored in the material benefits apportioned to the Allies in the treaty. The reparation commission is controlled by those who inflict upon her this humiliation. England and France are the large beneficiaries of German indemnities. Italy is excluded. There can be no reply to her modest claims, fortified by the wish of the people of Fiume to be returned to their own people. It is no compensation to reply that Fiume is to be converted into a mandatory city, held by the league or some of the principal member powers. Like Shantung, to delay is to deny. If it can not be given now to Italy, if ingratitude manifests itself at this early stage, it will mature into open hostility at the end of any given period when Italy claims, by the self-determination of the people and her own rights, the annexation of the city.

By this treaty we leave Italy with Jugo-Slavia, another Mexico, on her east-northeastern front. Not by my vote will I so requite our loyal associate in a common peril for her faith and her sacrifice. This great nation must be dealt with in terms of justice. Her men died amid Alpine snows, on the Piave, and in Macedonia. They fought in Siberia, in Lybia, within sight of Jerusalem's holy memories, and where Nineveh's crumbling walls tell of the unspeakable vanity of all human things. With one-thirty-second of the area of continental United States and one-third of our population, she sent 5,000,000 soldiers to bear arms under the colors of Italy and prove, not alone their allegiance to Victor Emanuel III and their country but their supreme faith in us and our associated nations. The epic of Italian heroism is written in blood from eastern France to the Holy Land, from the Baltic to the Sea of Galilee. Her unrequited faith and service cry from the Paris conference to this Senate Chamber for American justice. A league of nations born of repudiation of Italy's claims and the spoliation of China is cursed from birth with an irredeemable outrage on the rights of two ancient and friendly powers.

THE BROTHERHOOD DEMANDS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times of this date, entitled "The brotherhood demands." I had intended to accompany the offer with two or three reflections upon those demands; but, owing to the Senate's impatience to adjourn, I will postpone that until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times of Monday, Aug. 4, 1919.]

"THE BROTHERHOOD DEMANDS.

"Capital and labor by cooperating for the full measure of production can maintain the present prosperity of the country's industries, can maintain wages at the prevailing high rate; and increased production is the one sure way to reduce the cost of living. It is in the power of capital alone or of labor alone to destroy prosperity and to compel not merely the reduction of wages by widespread unemployment, but loss of wages through the enforced closing down of industries.

"The chiefs of the railroad brotherhoods have most unwisely taken a step, the nature and certain effect of which we are sure they have not sufficiently considered, for the success of their design would entail consequences from which they and the country may well pray to be delivered. The reading of the proclamation of purpose in which they demand the Government ownership of the railroads convinces us that Samuel Gompers should be here, not in Amsterdam, for his wiser mind and experienced eye would have detected the fallacies and false teachings ingrafted upon the document, evidently by that insidious influence which for many years has been trying to wrest from him the control or guidance of organized labor in this country. The demand of the brotherhoods is based upon the delusion that by operating the railroads 'democratically' by a board of 15 members, in which labor, the operating officials, and the public should have equal representation, increased efficiency would be assured, 'enormous' savings effected, rates reduced, and 'a share of the surplus at the end of each year' would be available for distribution among the wage-earning force. Human experience disproves this assumption altogether, and our present disastrous venture in Government operation of the railroads trumpets forth a warning that all but the deafest ears have heard against any further experiments of that nature.

"The plan of the brotherhoods commits the railroad into the joint control of politics and labor. The Government-appointed members of the board would inevitably and at all times be most solicitous to placate the labor members, and the two elements together would control railway policies. The chiefs of the brotherhoods may deceive themselves by the attempt at reasoning which they address to this point. They will not convince or deceive the public. Upon the great public of taxpayers would devolve the duty to make good the enormous deficit sure to accrue from the control of the lines in the interests of politics and labor, just as it falls upon them now. Instead of a billion or so a year, the cost assessed upon the taxpayers would rise to two or it may be to three billions a year, and for a service far inferior to that under private operation.

"The brotherhood chiefs seek the enforcement of their purpose through duress upon Congress and the country. They use the language of menace, as they did three years ago. They declare that 'the employees are in no mood to brook the return of the lines to their former control.' We are sure that on reflection they will see that these words are ill advised. It is an occasion for candid counsel and not for threats, and the Government, capital, and the country were never in a mood to be more considerate of the interests and the just demands of labor. Besides, they will not win by truculence. It is untimely. The country has just held a practical referendum on this very question, and the answer is a thundering demand for the return of the lines to private operation. We are told that the brotherhoods control 2,000,000 votes. Well, if the suffrage amendment goes into effect in time there will be 30,000,000 voters in the United States at the next election. Make their 2,000,000 votes 6,000,000, and they will still be overwhelmingly beaten on this issue.

"No party will be cowardly enough or reckless enough to invite disaster by yielding to this demand. Have the brotherhoods forgotten that they very nearly elected a Republican President in 1916 by the course they took to force the eight-hour law to enactment? In August Mr. Wilson's election was sure. The Republican Party had been rent asunder by the Progressive division of 1912. That it would be reunited and elect its candidate was considered impossible. The threat of the brotherhoods to paralyze the industries of the whole country by a strike and the unheard-of audacity of the methods they adopted in their dealings with the President and with Congress changed in a week the whole face and outlook of the campaign. In November the great industrial States, Ohio excepted, cast their votes for Mr. Hughes. After a period of harassing doubt it was known that Mr. Wilson had been elected by the votes of California, where the blame for an unlooked-for result was put in part upon HIRAM JOHNSON and in part upon the blunders of the Republican management. A change of less than 2,000 votes in that State would have defeated the party that yielded to the brotherhoods and made the Adamson bill a law.

"Party prudence and economic safety call now not for yieldings, but for the firmest resistance to the demand for running the railroads in the interest of a class at the cost of the whole people. There must be something more than that. The brotherhoods may sincerely believe in the efficacy of their remedy. It must be demonstrated to them candidly and patiently that they have been badly advised; that the path they have chosen leads to disaster for them and for the country. We trust that the President, profiting by what we have always considered grave errors of judgment in the course he followed three years ago, will now use his powers of persuasion with the railway men to win them from the delusions that possess their minds. The executive and legislative departments are giving earnest consideration to the problems of living cost. That is the surest way to present relief. And the resolve of every American who works either with brain or hand to eschew the dangerous nostrums of socialism and to go about the task of restoring the economic balance by the hard toil of the greatest possible production is the only way to permanent welfare and happiness."

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 5, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 5, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pause before Thee with reverence and in the spirit of worship seek Thy blessing as we face the ever-increasing demands of life upon us. We pray Thee to save us from the sin of forgetfulness of Thy past favors, from the fatal blunder of the neglect of Thy providence and of Thy care. May we put ourselves more fully in the hands of God, that the conflict of interest and purpose and opinion may come at last into a final adjustment in God's great program of life concerning us as a Nation. Guide us this day and every day by Thy grace. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DEMANDS OF RAILWAY TRAINMEN AND RACE RIOTS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to-day I shall submit some observations to the Senate upon the recent pronunciamentos of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, with some reference to the race riots in Washington and Chicago.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2594. An act to extend the time for the construction of the Broadway Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.;

S. 2595. An act to extend the time for the construction of the Main Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.; and

H. R. 3854. An act for the repeal of the daylight-saving law.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I present a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin relating to recognition of the services of soldiers, sailors, and marines. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution urging Congress to pass the bill introduced by Hon. MARVIN JONES relating to recognition of the services of soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Whereas it is fitting and proper that the character and spirit of the patriotic services of the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the United States in the war against Germany and its allies be appropriately recognized and that their financial sacrifices be, in a measure at least, repaid; and

Whereas the men who made up the armed forces of the United States came from each State of the Union, therefore their services and sacrifices should be recognized and provided for by the Federal Government to assure all a uniform and adequate compensation; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill introduced by the Hon. MARVIN JONES which provides that each soldier, sailor, and marine shall receive a $50 4 per cent Government bond for each month's service or major fractional part thereof in such war; and

Whereas such provision should be a substantial recognition of such services and sacrifices and would be greater than this State or any other State contemplates as compensation therefor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be respectfully urged to enact such bill into law at the earliest possible time and that each United States Senator and Representative in Congress from this State be earnestly requested to use his best efforts to secure the early passage of such measure; and be it further

Resolved, That a suitable copy of this resolution, properly attested, be transmitted to the presiding officer of each House of the Congress and to each United States Senator and Representative from this State.

RILEY S. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
EDWARD F. DITHMAR,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I also present a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, urging the enactment of legislation providing additional compensation for soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the war against Germany, Austria, and their allies. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution urging the Congress of the United States to enact legislation providing adequate compensation for soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the war against Germany, Austria, and their allies.

Whereas most of our soldiers, sailors, and marines in the war against Germany, Austria, and their allies sacrificed at a considerable financial loss established business connections and positions in agricultural, industrial, and other enterprises to serve their country; and

Whereas there is in this State and other States a desire and a strong purpose to fulfill the moral obligation, which they recognize, to compensate, in a measure at least, their soldiers, sailors, and marines because of loss so sustained and sacrifices so made; and

Whereas despite this strong desire and purpose this State and other States, because of constitutional inhibitions, have found it difficult, if not wholly impossible, to enact the necessary legislation to carry out their desires and purposes in this important matter: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature respectfully memoralize and urge the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation as may be necessary to adequately compensate soldiers, sailors, and marines for financial losses sustained and financial sacrifices made by them during the period of their valiant and heroic service to their country; be it further

Resolved, That a suitable copy of this resolution, properly attested, be transmitted to the President of the United States, the presiding officer of each House of the Congress, and to each United States Senator and Representative in Congress from this State.

RILEY S. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
EDWARD F. DITHMAR,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 102, Knights of Pythias, of Covina, Calif., and a petition of Moving Picture Operators' Local Union No. 297, of San Diego, Calif., praying for the ratification of the league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MOSES presented a memorial of Local Grange No. 273, Patrons of Husbandry, of London Center, N. H., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NEWBERRY (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a memorial of the Live Stock Association of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Kendrick bills providing for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am in receipt of a memorial addressed to the Congress of the United States from the former managing editor of the Stars and Stripes, which was published in France by the American Expeditionary Forces. I think its importance warrants its being printed in the RECORD, and I make that request and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

In behalf of the six soldiers who made up the editorial council of the Stars and Stripes, and expressing the unanimous and often voiced sentiment of all the men who, from first to last, wrote the text and drew the pictures of that weekly journal of the American Expeditionary Forces, I respectfully urge that the right to use its name as the title of a publication be reserved by law as the property of the United States Army, to be used by that Army if and whenever the need of the Nation calls for another such expedition as gave birth to the Stars and Stripes.

The official publication of the American Expeditionary Forces, which was born in France February 8, 1918, published its final number in Paris on June 13, 1919, a fortnight before the signing of the treaty at Versailles. Its columns announced then what several earlier issues had forecast, that the Stars and Stripes was being hauled down to be folded and put away beyond reach of any trafficker in the publication market. Many proposals to continue it into civilian life—proposals worthy and unworthy, from big men and little—were made to its editors and by them rejected. This rejection had the hearty and explicit support of the Secretary of War and of the commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces.

The Stars and Stripes was so true an expression of the spirit of the American Expeditionary Forces and so proudly the property of the troops that no one at all sensitive to their struggle and sacrifice would wish to foster a paper under the same name—under the name of the American flag—in civilian America. It is urged, therefore, that it be bequeathed unimpaired and untarnished to the American Army in time of war; that it be set aside as the rightful inheritance of the writers and artists in the ranks of the next American Expeditionary Forces.

HAROLD W. ROSS,
Formerly Managing Editor of the Stars and Stripes.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 18, 1919.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, JR.,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WADSWORTH: When you were in France you undoubtedly saw evidences of the deserved popularity of the Army's newspaper, the Stars and Stripes, among the men of the Expeditionary Forces. The paper was a great financial success as well as a sentimental success in France, and the temptation to utilize the name, with its appeal on a private, commercial, postbellum publication was strong. The young men on the editorial council, however, resolved that the name should die with the paper (unless it were to be revived during an occasion similar to the recent emergency), in order that the fine repute of the publication might not suffer in the future.

It happens, however, that a paper has been started in America with the same name and with an attempt to capitalize the appeal which the Stars and Stripes built up among the American soldiers in France. The original editorial council has prepared a memorial to the Congress, requesting that the right to use the Stars and Stripes as the title of a publication be reserved by law as the property of the United States Army, to be used if and whenever the need of the Nation calls for another expedition as brought forth the paper recently discontinued in France.

They have shown me this memorial, and I have taken the liberty of telling them that in sending it to you they might say that it went with my hearty approval and indorsement.

I attach hereto also a cablegram from Gen. Pershing, indicating a similar feeling on his part.

Cordially, yours,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

[Copy of cablegram received at the War Department, Washington, D. C., June 8, 1919, 9.05 p. m., from headquarters American Expeditionary Forces to The Adjutant General, Washington, D. C.]

FOR SECRETARY OF WAR BAKER.

Just received following cable:

"American Legion informed that Stars and Stripes about to be commercially published by Butterick Co., New York, who has engaged Waldo and Rossby. We are strongly opposed, as is also the Secretary of War. With approval of the latter, we request cable from you disapproving commercial publication, in order to facilitate immediate action which we are taking.

"(Signed) THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
" BENNET CLARK,
" HENRY LINSLEY,
" LUKE LEE,
" ERIC WOOD,
National Commission."

Stars and Stripes was created for the purpose of keeping the men of the American Expeditionary Forces informed and for the further purpose of assisting in maintaining the high morale of the soldiers. Unselfishly edited by soldiers of remarkable journalistic abilities and written under the inspiration of the achievements of the soldiers of this Army, it has fulfilled in every way the purpose for which it was created. I seriously doubt if a paper of this character can be maintained except under the conditions which gave birth to this publication. I question the advisability of using the name Stars and Stripes on a journal maintained for any other purpose. I am opposed to its being used on a paper published for commercial purposes.

PERSHING.

NAVAL STATION, PENSACOLA, FLA.

Mr. PAGE. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 562) for the relief of occupants of certain premises within the naval station at Pensacola, Fla., and I submit a report (No. 141) thereon. While I think this bill ought to receive immediate consideration, I will not make the motion at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It is a local matter, and I think we might dispose of it at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. Let the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. PAGE. There is an amendment to the bill which I should like to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask to have the bill go over for to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

FLINT RIVER BRIDGE, GEORGIA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce without amendment the bill (H. R. 7110) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across Flint River in the State of Georgia, and I submit a report (No. 142) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by act of Congress approved April 17, 1916, to be built across the Flint River, Ga., by Mitchell County, or by Baker County, Ga., jointly or separately, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 2728) for the relief of settlers and entrymen on Baca Float No. 3, in the State of Arizona (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 2729) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Asheville, N. C., a captured German gun (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 2730) for an addition to the reclamation fund established under the act of June 17, 1902; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 2731) granting a pension to Anton Casper; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 2732) for the relief of Edward H. Dennison; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2733) to provide for the training of officers of the Army in aeronautic engineering and the issue of equipment and materials therefor; and

A bill (S. 2734) to authorize the transportation of civilians across the Atlantic Ocean upon Army transports under such rules and regulations and at such rates as the Secretary of War may prescribe; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 82) to place certain surplus Army medical supplies at the disposal of the American Red Cross; and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 83) to permit the payment for certain lands where requisition of the title thereto was duly served and possession taken thereunder or where a binding agreement was entered into followed by the taking possession thereof and erection of improvements thereon, prior to July 11, 1919; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IMPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, under a Senate resolution there was compiled from consular reports a large amount of information upon the importation of convict-made goods into the United States. I have a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, and I wish to bring this report to the attention of the Committee on Printing and suggest that it be printed as a public document. I think it is a matter which ought to be referred, however, to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

ADDRESS OF GEORGE CLAPPERTON.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. President, in behalf of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] I ask to have printed in the RECORD an address of the president of the Michigan State Bar Association, delivered at Ann Arbor June 20.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT, GEORGE CLAPPERTON, OF GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., DELIVERED AT THE TWENTY-NINTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE MICHIGAN STATE BAR ASSOCIATION, ANN ARBOR, MICH., JUNE 20, 1919.

THE CHARTED COURSE.

"In obedience to established precedent the first number upon our annual program is an address by the president. In that address I should like to voice the spirit that animates the membership of this association and which, I pray, may brood over the deliberations of this annual meeting—I mean the spirit of vigilant Americanism.

"The year since last we met is the most momentous in human history. In that year has come the victorious termination of the war, the greatest catastrophe of the world.

"The war marked the end of one great epoch and the beginning of another in the political and social development of the human race. For more than four tragic years the mighty nations of the earth have been engaged to the utmost limit of strength, the last ounce of energy, in wielding the primeval forces with which God Almighty made his universe to destroy men and the handiwork of men.

"That war was a crucial incident in God's eternal purpose in shaping human destiny. This great war for self-preservation of freemen, the final overthrow of autocracy, and the enthronement of democracy in the government of men was bravely fought and nobly won. And now the thought and activity of the victorious peoples are directed to the proposition that such a war shall never come again. Personally, I have no apprehension that such a war ever will or ever can come again. True, autocracy still remains powerful in our world, but in my judgment, so long as history shall be read by men, so long as reason shall exist in human minds, no power can again undertake to dominate the world through war. Even Japan may never forget the lessons of this war. So long as human nature remains in this old earth of ours there will be recurring wars and continuing conflict and strife among nations and peoples, great and small, but for different purposes than those for which this war was waged.

"One mighty form of tyranny has been overthrown forever, but other forms of tyranny, strong and implacable, will appear; indeed, they are here now. The standards and powers of the old order are passing out of our world, but a new order of different standards and different powers is on the way. Human selfishness, greed, arrogance, rapacity, and ignorance, purple robed, will fiercely strive to dominate, and other mighty conflicts for freedom and right, and justice and good government will come—are already imminent.

"President Wilson, in one his impelling phrases, recently proclaimed that 'the peoples of the world are awake, and the peoples of the world are in the saddle. Private counsels of statesmen can not now and can not hereafter determine the destinies of nations.' But peoples in saddles are unsteady and uncertain riders, and their riding may be for the fall of riders and saddles and steeds. Furthermore, statesmen who thus in ominous phrase are to be unhorsed and trampled under foot of peoples, and who can not hereafter determine and shape the destinies of nations, may include the type of Washington and Lincoln as well as the type the President obviously had in mind.

"The supreme triumph of the sword over autocratic tyranny has left the world in political, social, and industrial chaos. All governments are imperiled. The supreme effort and final test of the new order of government is yet to come—has already begun. The great issue is whether mankind shall be subjects or citizens.

"May I not without offense advert to another insinuating phrase of our absentee President, directed perhaps toward the new order in his recent address before the French Academy of Moral and Political Science? 'International law has been handled too exclusively by lawyers. Lawyers like definite lines. They like systematic arrangement. They are uneasy if they depart from what was done yesterday. They dread experiments. They liked charted seas, and if they have no charts they hardly venture to take the voyage.' Of course, such liquid phrase has the superficial effect of pleasing popular fancy, but hardly appeals with convincing force to the legal or thoughtful mind.

"The American legal voyager over seas, known or unknown, is perhaps less tempted than other men to heed the siren voices of the air and more inclined to sail in charted seas and to be guided by fixed stars in God's azure skies in order to reach the objective haven of safety and peace. Indeed, it may be doubted whether the legal navigator would launch 14 points upon a great sea of darkness or suspend the duties of Chief Executive under our Constitution to personally direct a European conference. To the legal mind, when American representation in the great peace conference was required, the charted course of constitutional navigation would have called for the nomination of delegates from among our great statesmen and international lawyers and their confirmation by the Senate of the United States, such delegates to be the accredited representatives of America in such conference. When the Chief Executive appointed himself and four other inexperienced navigators of his own choosing, regardless of the advice and consent of the Senate, part of our treaty-making power, to navigate uncharted seas, it resulted in the representation of himself, and not the Nation or the American people in the settlement of the greatest issue in the annals of mankind.

"The lawyer navigator of political seas would provide himself with a reliable compass and rudder and follow the beckoning polar star of the American Constitution, the supreme law of the land. The lawyer would follow the charted constitutional course in driving our ship of state and leave Lenin and Trotski, Debs and Berger to plunge forth upon uncharted seas of unrestrained democracy. The lawyer would aim to make the charted course of the Republic safer and clearer for the generations of men to navigate.

"The old order of government is indeed changing. The mighty pendulum of government is swinging—swinging at random through changing centuries, from monarchy and autocracy to representative government, from representative government to functionless government of peoples, from constitutional government to Bolshevism or direct democracy gorged with freedom, laying the foundations of despotism. The old order is changing in our experimental government of the people, by the people, for the people. May we in our day and generation restore this Government of ours, the great experiment of human history, to its charted course under the Federal Constitution, to the end that there may be preserved for the American people and all free peoples through the generations of men the liberty and equality of conditions we have enjoyed within the law, for the law, and by the law.

"Our ship of state, the great Republic, was launched upon a perilous voyage over unknown and unsounded seas under the most reliable chart ever devised by the brain and purpose of man—the Federal Constitution. It followed under Divine Providence the stars of human destiny toward the haven of permanent peace and tranquillity of individual liberty, of justice and order, of equality of conditions among men. It has covered but a short distance of its long and uncertain voyage. It has encountered storms and perils and grave crises. Its charted course is the 'last best hope of earth.' Thomas Paine stopped the publication of the Crisis when he heard the news of the treaty of 1783 with the remark, 'The times that tried men's souls are over.' But John Fisk on this observes that the next five years were to be the most critical period of all, and in turn said that 'The most critical period of our country's history was the period between 1783 and the adoption of the Constitution in 1788,' 'the finest specimen of constructive statesmanship that the world has ever seen,' embodying the saving principle of representation in self-government. This principle marked the distinction between 'democracy' and 'republicanism' that is between direct legislative action and representative government. The founders were substantially united upon this principle. History afforded no example of so large an act of constructive statesmanship as the adoption of the American Constitution. That Constitution saved the American people from anarchy.

"Samuel Adams 'wanted the whole world to realize that the rule of a republic is a rule of law and order, and that liberty does not mean license.' And Washington, in his brief but immortal speech at the Federal Convention, said, 'Let us raise the standard to which the wise and honest can repair; the event is in the hand of God.' The government to be established had for its basis the republican principle, the sovereignty of the individual citizen. To make a federal government immediately operative upon 'individual citizens' the Federal courts were organized to pass judgment in all cases in which 'individual citizens' were amenable to the national law. These courts were charged with the interpretation according to the general principles of the common law of the Constitution itself. 'This is the most noble, as it is the most distinctive feature in the Government of the United States.' This feature is the saving power of our great charter of self-government. The practical working of that Constitution during the first 30 years of the nineteenth century was directed by the luminous decisions of John Marshall and other great jurists foremost among the founders of the Union.

"One crisis had passed, but the framers of this great chart of government glided into the deepening shadow of impending civil war. Then another great storm was weathered, another great crisis safely overcome. This was succeeded by a period of half a century of unprecedented growth in population, native and foreign born, of the development of complex political, social, and industrial conditions beyond all conceptions of the founders of the Republic.

"These conditions now involve the application of the principles of constitutional self-government to a new social order without precedent or parallel in all the annals of democracy—a new crisis, which will subject our form of government to the final supreme test of the strength and the efficacy of democracy among men. The most conspicuous and dominant figure emerging from the throes of the great war is not Hindenburg or Kaiser, not Haig or Lloyd-George, not Foch or Clemenceau, not Pershing or Wilson, but the plain American citizen charged with the duties and responsibilities of sovereignty in the great Republic. The most powerful and potential nation coming out of the chaos of world conflict is the United States, with 100,000,000 individual rulers composed of very human beings, just ordinary men and women. Upon this people and upon this Nation the eyes of the world are turned with flickering faith of despair. In all the political firmament that envelopes our world there is no other fixed star of hope. With abiding faith in the God of Nations, I firmly believe that this Republic is the star of political destiny.

"And yet the lawyer can not be oblivious to the fact that for a generation this Republic has been rapidly drifting in a great gulf stream of popular government, away from the charted course of the Constitution, and that during and since the great World War there have been evolved two extremes of government, autocratic power in practice and socialistic democracy in movement against constituted government. The condition that happily did not exist in America when De Tocqueville wrote of American Government has come, and in the United States 'that numerous and turbulent multitude does exist who, regarding the law as their natural enemy, look upon it with fear and distrust.'

"The old ship of state is now in our day and generation entering the most perilous part of its momentous voyage of its charted course. Above it the skies are black with pent-up storms and beneath it the angry waters are lashed with the murmurs or seismic forces. The times that will try the souls of men have come. We are entering the great crisis, the crucial test of self-government. The political and social order is changing, is being revolutionized, and new and mighty destinies for America and mankind are impending. We are approaching universality of democracy as a governing force throughout the world.

"The forces of disorder and unrest now seek to annihilate regularly constituted government. The world is facing the irresponsible tyranny of unrestrained democracy. Democracy undirected, unrestrained, subjugated peoples uncaged and gorged with license, demented and controlled by wild, brutal instincts, is Bolshevism. The free peoples of the world have become elated, satiated with the specious phrase that war has made the world safe for democracy. But the world is not safe for democracy. Democracy is not yet safe for the world.

"The war has left hundreds of millions of people, deprived of the steadying force of regularly constituted government, unprepared and unfit for self-government. The most that can be said of these freed peoples is that they are entitled to opportunity to develop capacity for self-government, perhaps under mandatory power and direction. Self-inflicted democracy under existing conditions would be disastrous to them.

"I feel that there is no substantial ground for apprehension as to Bolshevism in the true sense of the term in the United States. There is a good deal of sense in a recent expression of Alexander F. Kerensky, who knows something about this human malady: 'Bolshevism can not grow in a land where people are well fed and generally content, as they are in the United States. Bolshevism is a disease of tired and exhausted nations and of populations that have been abused for years and decades. You're perfectly safe from such a disease in the United States, I assure you.' Nevertheless, the United States, with its vast mixed population and complex conditions, is not safe for democracy. Direct democracy is government dominated by mere numbers, and partakes of the weakness of the whole community—the rule of individual sovereignty without saving qualifications. The great political world problem to-day is whether self-government may be made safe for America, and ultimately safe for the world, through the success of the great experiment in self-government under our Constitution—the Republic. Shall the governing force of the Republic be so directed by the active patriotic spirit of vigilant Americanism as to preserve individual liberty and develop rather than destroy equality of conditions among men? Shall we, the people of the United States, organized under constitutional government, have political and social evolution or revolution? Shall this Nation permanently attain and retain the liberty and equality or be subject to the tyranny and despotism of democracy? Political and social evolution or revolution—that is the problem: to make the power and stability and efficiency of democracy under our constituted form of government safe for America, and through America ultimately safe for the world.

"Samuel Gompers, the powerful leader of organized labor presenting itself as a claimant for the crown of supremacy over government of law, recently gave expression to the true vision when he said: 'We have used the term democracy glibly and often without understanding.' That admonition might also be well directed to other classes of citizens who assume superiority of intelligence and virtue. Liberty and equality require the supremacy of the law. Our Constitution is a guaranty of the supremacy of the law as distinguished from a government of functionaries. All forms of absolutism and autocracy, including the democratic form, spurn the idea of fundamental law in government.

"These are the truths that the present and future generations of American citizens, men and women, should and will learn and loyally maintain. America must restore or inaugurate and maintain a reign of law under our constitutional form of government to dispel enmity and conflict between individuals and between classes. The absolute sovereignty of the individual citizen must be forever maintained. The intelligent will of the majority must remain the source of authority. But we must continue to guard against the wrongful exercise of sovereignty, the absolutism and tyranny of the majority. Everything depends upon the intelligence and virtue of the majority. It has been said that the voice of the people is often anything rather than the voice of God, and that the people can do no wrong is as misleading as that the King can do no wrong. And again: 'If ever the free institutions of America are destroyed, that event may be attributed to the omnipotence of the majority.' Said Madison: 'It is of great importance in a republic not only to guard society against the oppression of its rulers, but to guard one part of society against the injustice of the other part, for justice is the end of government.' What is called the republic in the United States is the tranquil rule of the majority. But the power of the majority itself is not unlimited. 'Above it in the moral world are humanity, justice, and reason and in the political world vested rights.'

"In the midst of this changing order it behooves the sovereign citizen, especially the lawyer, to assimilate or review the elementary principles of a government of law and order under our Constitution; to note and understand the distinction between the ancient (and present) idea of democracy and our modern constitutional democracy. The former was the rule of the 'demos' of free and equal citizens, an attempt to secure the liberty and promote the welfare of all by distributing political power and rule equally among all. The latter vests the power and sovereignty in all—in the people—but the exercise thereof is intrusted to selected representatives of the people. The former was always direct; the latter is representative. The one can exist only in a small State. A great nation under complex conditions must resort to the other.

"The populace is inclined to give free reign to passion and prejudices 'to envy and oppress the nobler and better minority, whose existence is a standing reproach and protest against its own rule.' The worst quality of the 'demos' comes to the surface—ignorance, pride, arbitrary caprice, the love of frequent change. Again, the chief characteristic of every democracy is the love of equality—and masses are inclined to want to act for themselves, because representation gives a certain preference and appearance of superiority to chosen representatives. They fail to recognize the superiority of intelligence and virtue. Equality which commends itself to the many is equality in numbers. Its formula is not 'each according to its merits' but 'one as another.'

"This equality on which direct democracy is ostensibly founded becomes a delusion and a sham when advancing civilization and complex conditions have brought inevitable differences and contrasts. The only successful democracy is representative democracy as developed in the United States under our written Constitution, the only great experiment in national democracy under modern complex conditions. Under this form the citizens participate directly in public affairs, such as voting on constitutional and fundamental laws, but generally govern through their representatives. The people are the source of power and authority, but the general affairs of practical government are delegated to representatives.

"Montesqieu declared the principle of democracy to be virtue. But virtue as a political principle presupposes not the equality of all but a respect for the moral worth and intelligence of representatives not found in a pure democracy. Virtue is the political principle of representative democracy, a more moderate and more noble form of democracy, because it partakes of the advantages of aristocracy, its principles being that the best may direct the practical affairs of government in the name and by the authority of the people. Representative democracy ascribes the right of sovereignty to the majority but intrusts its exercise to the minority. The great difficulty, the supreme test, is in establishing and maintaining a system that secures the best men in intellect and in character to exercise authority as representatives. True representation can only be secured by a system by which every element and every interest in the nation shall be represented in proportion to its relation to the whole. Number is important but not sufficient. The Constitution recognizes that the majority has neither the time nor ability actually to exercise the duties of self-government, but credits the majority with sufficient intelligence and interest to participate in elections and select the fittest men for its representatives. It demands less from the citizen than direct democracy but more from its representatives.

"And so all serious and earnest reflection brings us logically back to the Republic and the intelligence and responsibility of the citizen to make democracy safe for men everywhere. May we summarize the views that lead to this conclusion? Under the plan of our great charter was established the best form of government mankind had ever known. It has been modified and has largely ceased to function in accordance with the original plan. We have steadily drifted away from the charted course of the Constitution, of government by law, toward the dangers of direct democracy.

"By direct participation in legislation and other governmental functions we are passing from the Republic toward democracy, from representative statesmanship to demagogism, following a course of progressive retrogression. When we theorize about making the world safe for democracy, we are oblivious to the fact that democracy is the most dangerous form on earth, a form that has never given good government. The Government of the Constitution was that of a Republic, sometimes miscalled representative democracy, not a democracy. The framers of the Constitution sought to avoid the evils of autocracy on the one hand and of democracy on the other by establishing a Republic, the first republic the world had ever known. The tendency of democracy with respect to industry and property is communistic or socialistic toward the destruction of both. The tendency of a republic is toward individual rights, ownership, the supremacy of the law, and equality of conditions. The attitude of democracy toward law is the enactment of the will of the majority without regard to whether it is based on intelligence and deliberation or directed by ignorance, passion, prejudice, and impulse. The attitude of constitutional government toward law is the deliberate enactment of laws through representatives, of the intelligence and virtue of the people and the administration of justice. Aristotle's classification of the forms of government comprised the two extremes represented by monarchy, a government of one, and democracy, a government of the masses. It was reserved for the founders of this Republic, the framers of our Constitution, to found a Government that preserved the advantages and guarded against the evils of the two extremes. Imperfectly applied, it has still preserved the best form of government ever devised—the nearest approach to a government of law rather than a government of men. When the Constitution was adopted the rights of democracy had been safeguarded by an organized government. The citizens did not exist for the advantage of the State. The State existed for the benefit and protection of the citizen. That Constitution may be adapted to the changing needs and conditions of expanding complex life, but its fundamental principles are unchangeable. The Constitution offers a legal and adequate remedy for every evil that afflicts the body politic.

"The Constitution embraces just four essential elements:

"(1) An executive and (2) a legislative body, who, working together in a representative capacity, have all power of appointment, all power of legislation, all power to raise and expend money, and are required to do just two things—(3) to create a judiciary to pass upon the justice and legality of their governmental acts and (4) to recognize certain inherent individual rights. The founders were thinking of 'liberty, of representative government, of protection against tyranny and spoliation, and of ways and means by which public opinion might in orderly fashion express itself in statute laws, in judicial judgments, and in executive acts.' 'It is a noteworthy and singular characteristic of our American Government that the Constitution provides a means for protecting individual liberty from invasion by the powers of government itself, as well as from invasion by others more powerful and less scrupulous than ourselves. The principles underlying our civil and political liberty are indelibly written into the Constitution of the United States and the Nation's courts are instituted for their protection.'

"'This representative Republic under the Constitution of the United States,' says the same writer, 'is a more advanced, a more just, and a wiser form of government than the socialistic and direct democracy which it is now proposed to substitute for it.'

"Said another American author: 'I would fight for every line in the Constitution as I would fight for every star in the flag, for flag and Constitution will live or die together.' 'I know not if the times are ripe or if events are merely gathering to a head; but soon there must come some one—some Washington in the field or some Marshall in the forum—who will sound a trumpet that will once more rally us to the defense of the law.'

"Every departure or variation from the form of government provided by the Constitution has been a dangerous experiment. The Republic is at this hour engaged in the consideration of one of the gravest questions ever presented to a great nation—the determination of the treaty of peace and the proposed league of nations covenant. Under our Great Charter the responsibility rests entirely upon the President and the Senate of the United States as coequals in the treaty-making power of the Government. The correct determination of this question calls for the exercise of the highest degree of deliberate wisdom and judgment. The fate of the Nation hangs upon it. And yet we are confronted with the astounding proposition that this treaty-making power is not to be trusted, but is to be influenced and directed by some indefinable expression of popular will. The suggestion comes that the President will 'swing around the circle' in a speech-making tour in an appeal over his coequal in the treaty-making power to the populace in mass meetings. In my judgment such a course would not be in accord with the philosophy or spirit of our Great Charter or with the wisdom and courage of its founders. An unconstitutional plebiscite might command some degree of wisdom and deliberation in popular expression, but the course proposed would tend to substitute public clamor, mere voices of the air, for the intelligent consideration and deliberate wisdom and judgment of our highest representative body under the Constitution.

"There never was a time in the life of the Republic when the interests of this great people and of civilization required such deliberate and reverential observance of the spirit of our Great Charter of liberty and self-government as in this crucial hour of our national destiny. Socialism, anarchy, initiative, referendum, judicial recall, Government ownership, are but phases of democracy, dangerous experiments which imperil the very foundations of the Republic. They are each and all un-American.

"When one great President seeks by a process of emasculation to sap the authority, strength, and virility of our constitutional courts by subjecting their decisions to the approval of a majority vote, and subject legislation to popular direction and approval, and another great President and a national Congress are coerced by the threat of a railroad strike to enact a law at the behest of a special interest, arbitrarily fixing hours of labor and rates of wages, the fundamental principles of sound constitutional government are imperiled. When constitutional amendments foreign to our theory of individual freedom and constitutional rights are made not with adequate reflection and consideration, but by hasty popular will, constitutional government is imperiled. When ponderous volumes of law are initiated by general petition and enacted by popular vote, constitutional government is weakened and in danger. When nonpartisan leagues seek to abrogate constitutional protection, eliminate the primary courts of justice, and nominate and elect judges pledged to construe the law and the constitution of a State as political conventions desire, making judges of the courts of law mere political delegates, a pistol is aimed at the very heart of our representative government. When an American lawyer, giving counsel to a great organization of American labor, admonishes his client that 'one of the gravest fundamental questions with which we have to deal is the preservation of a truly democratic government against what has often been called the "aristocracy of the robe,"' a note of alarm has been sounded. When the saving limitations of the Federal Constitution upon the tyranny and excesses of the majority of voters are removed, representative government is destroyed and unrestrained democracy established. When the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of our Government are subject to the unlimited, unrestrained, direct action of temporary majorities of voters, American Bolshevism takes the place of constituted government. When all these things take place, there is established the tyranny of majorities, a tyranny which may be as ruthless as that of military autocracy.

"There is no legitimate place in this Republic for the autocracy of capital or the autocracy of the proletariat. Both must be subject to the restraints of constitutional limitations upon arbitrary power and to the supreme majesty of the law of the land. It was for the protection of civil liberty and equal rights that constitutional limitations were imposed upon the exercise of power.

"This overlegislated, overregulated, overcommissioned, overgoverned people has drifted far from the moorings and the charted course of our constitutional form of self-government. The rapidly growing tendency in this Government to do through direct will and action of changing majorities those things which majorities can not safely and rightly do is subversive of the principles of constitutional self-government and destructive of all government. The average citizen knows little of the problems and duties of the courts of justice and less of the purpose and necessity of a constitution and the means of enforcing it. They have the ballot practically without qualifications, and unrestrained by legal limitations of power can do anything they choose, and the danger arising from popular inexperience, passion, and prejudice is very great. In the past four years men have laid down their lives that government by law and not by might shall prevail. Yet here at home men assert the doctrine that there is no such thing as an established constitution or government of law which any temporary majority need respect, and people are being systematically taught that American principles of government are wrong and are to be opposed and resisted and the vagaries of alien agitators substituted.

"The present age of the Republic may appropriately be designated as the age of the demagogue. The demagogue is the natural product, indigenous to the soil, of democracy. The demagogue is the advance agent of the mob. He is essentially destructive rather than constructive. Posing as the friend of the people, he makes an insidious appeal to popular ignorance, prejudice, and passion, and weakens public faith in the fundamental principles of our Government and in its wisdom and justice. The cynical Carlyle must have had this species in mind when he likened democracy to a box of vipers—each trying to get to the top. But every demagogue has his day. His influence will diminish with the increasing wisdom, virtue, common sense, common honesty, and patriotism of the American people. He has no legitimate place in the philosophy of our constitutional government.

"I have abiding faith in our Republic. I believe it will pass safely through this 'most critical period.' The ship of state will survive the test of storm and wave. Self-government under our Great Charter will endure and become safe for this people and for the world. The spirit of the great founders, that vigilant Americanism, will prevail over all the elements of disintegration and destruction. There will be periods of unrest, recession, and retrogression, but the Nation will not be permanently diverted from its charted course. The philosophy of our Constitution will guide aright. The permanent maintenance of the Republic will be the greatest performance of history—the supreme test of the ability and endurance of a free people. The future of mankind hangs upon the results of our experiment. The greatest service the American people can perform for mankind is to complete their divinely appointed task—to establish a government of law and order that will endure forever. America is shaping human destiny.

"I have long believed that the legitimate period of our splendid isolation is over. When this Republic became a recognized world power it necessarily assumed the responsibility of such a power among the nations. God never made a nation great without great responsibility. This Nation must do its part and exert its influence under Divine Providence in shaping the destiny of mankind. But, first of all, its chief duty is to establish, maintain, and develop its own nationality, its own strength and character, to carry out the great experiment of history, to build a Republic upon the foundation of our Constitution, strong and secure for the maintenance of individual liberty and equality of conditions. That Republic will be the proudest heritage of the future and our greatest contribution to civilization and mankind.

"The war has taught Americans the greatest lessons of citizenship that may save the Republic and the world, viz, the spirit of service and sacrifice; the inalienable duties, as well as the inalienable rights of mankind. The spirit of service in the faithful performance of those duties will solve the problems of democracy, will direct this Government of free people upon its charted course for permanent democracy for the world. The spirit of service and recognition of inalienable rights and duties of men will subordinate to or associate self-interest with the common good, will solve the crucial problems of capital and labor and other conflicting interests that imperil social order.

"During the past year we have endeavored to arouse among the members of this association a sense of the power and necessity of American education and American propaganda and of the benefits of self-government under our constitutional plan. As we have pointed out through our literature, the propaganda we most need is the right and vital teaching of true Americanism. We must Americanize the alien—instruct primitive folk in the first principles of citizenship—bring them to understand that democracy is first the government of self. We must teach the American public the essentials of our republican faith—teach the populace how to rule themselves—that true democracy is based not upon the rights but upon the duties of man—to place the common good above our own good—and finally that democracy means responsibility and service of citizens.

"May the members of this association, the lawyers of a great constituent Commonwealth, appreciate their duty, the responsibility of their citizenship and their great profession, and aid to the utmost, in this critical period of self-government, the permanent establishment of its fundamental principles.

"Listen: 'The authority Americans have intrusted to members of the legal profession and the influence these individuals exercise in their Government is the most powerful existing security against the excesses and dangers of democracy.' This was written by the great Frenchman—De Tocqueville—in his philosophical exposition of the fundamental principles of democracy in America three-quarters of a century ago. And again he said: 'Lawyers are attached to public order beyond every other consideration, and the best security of public order is authority. It must not be forgotten that if they prize the free institutions of their country much they nevertheless value the legality of these institutions more.' 'I question,' said he, 'whether democratic institutions could long be maintained, and I can not believe that a republic could subsist at the present time, if the influence of lawyers in public business did not increase in proportion to the power of the people.'

"Lawyers know the charted course of the supremacy of our Federal Constitution and the majesty of the law of the land, and know the meaning of the greatest experiment in democracy that the world has ever tried; they know that the Republic has as yet hardly been tried. May they appreciate their responsibility and power as sovereign rulers of the Republic, to the end that America, in the language of Mr. James M. Beck, in addressing the last American Bar Association, 'may point the way to that far-off divine event toward which the whole creation moves, when the rules of justice as formulated by the common conscience of mankind shall have complete sway throughout the world.'"

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have a letter calling attention to the claim that certain classes of brokers not actually merchants are buying up large quantities of foodstuffs for the purpose of holding them to retail at high prices. I merely wish to present it and refer it to whatever committee is investigating this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have here a resolution which I desire to read to the Senate. It is short, and is as follows:

[Middle Tennessee Farmers' Institute, Hon. Edw. J. Graham, President, Centerville; Col. Harry S. Berry, Vice President, Hendersonville; C. G. Burkitt, Secretary-Treasurer, Antioch.]

From the proceedings of the Middle Tennessee Farmers' Institute, July 22–24, 1919, a resolution on legislation pending in the Congress of the United States aimed to regulate the live-stock industry.

"Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States certain legislation aimed to regulate the live-stock industry by placing it under an elaborate license system and Government supervision of the packing houses, stockyards, and commission men, particularly do we refer to the Kendrick bill No. 2199 and the Kenyon bill No. 2202: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Middle Tennessee Farmers' Institute, now assembled at Columbia, Tenn., That we are unalterably opposed to these bills, and we protest their enactment and call upon our Senators and Congressmen to use their influence against these bills.

"This legislation, as proposed in these bills, is drastic, a step toward paternalism and Government control of our commercial industries. We are urged on every hand to increase the production of food animals, but the cost of production has greatly increased, and we feel that we should have free and unhampered markets for our live stock. The proposed legislation will impede progress in the packing-house industry in the South, hamper our business, and tend to reducing prices for food animals without reducing the cost to the consumer.

"Not only de we oppose this legislation, but any legislation that tends toward paternalism; we feel that there is no place in the greatest democracy in the world for paternalism; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of the institute is hereby instructed to communicate a copy of this resolution to the Senators and Congressmen from this State who are in Washington.

"HERVEY WHITFIELD, Chairman.
"SAM N. WARREN.
"HOMER HANCOCK.
"F. H. DUNKLIN."

Respectfully communicated as instructed.

C. G. BURKITT, Secretary.

ANTIOCH, TENN., July 28, 1919.

It is signed by a number of splendid gentlemen in my State. I ask to have the names of the signers printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, differing from the authors of this resolution in several respects I want to make this statement. I have here a letter which I will read to the Senate. It is in the nature of a reply to the resolution. I read as follows:

AUGUST 4, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. BURKITT: The resolution of the Middle Tennessee Farmers' Institute in connection with the Kenyon and Kendrick bills has reached me and will have my most careful attention.

I would say that I do not entirely agree with you in reference to the purpose of these bills. The five big packers of the country control the price of meats and they have been constantly increasing their power of control. The difference between what they pay for live stock and what is charged for the meat products is so great as to lead me to believe that some sort of regulation should be had by Congress.

I agree with you entirely that you should have free and unhampered markets for your live stock. This you do not have. I have always stood with the farmers, and I expect to do so because upon them the prosperity of our whole country is based.

I think that regulation should be entirely fair to the packers and, at the same time, should be entirely fair to the public. Instead of reducing the price of live stock to the farmers, proper regulation will undoubtedly increase the price to the farmers. And I am sure this must have been the idea of Senator KENDRICK, because he is one of the largest live-stock raisers in the world. His interests must of necessity be along the same lines of your association.

If the packers are doing a fair and honest business, regulation by the Government can not hurt them. On the other hand, if they are depressing the price paid to the farmers for live stock and increasing the price charged the consumer by means of monopoly, then I am sure you will agree with me they should be regulated.

From a report of the Federal Trade Commission it appears that the packing industry, which is controlled by five packers in Chicago, is controlling not only the meat supply but probably the entire food supply of the country. I know that you will agree that this is a very serious matter when a handful of men control the food supply of a great nation, fixing the price that is paid the producers and at which they must sell, and also fixing the price that is paid by the consumers and at which they must buy.

My mind is entirely open on this subject; I have no prejudice about it, but you can see the trend of my thoughts.

We are going to examine into the matter very carefully, and hope to reach a conclusion that will be satisfactory to the country. I am studying it with a view to coming to a definite conclusion, but this letter will indicate to you the way that my best thought is running. If it is in the right direction I hope to hear from you; if not I also hope to hear from you, giving me your reasons for believing that it is not in the right direction. In other words, I should like to have an answer from you to the suggestions that I have made in this letter.

It is being charged here that many of these resolutions are suggested by those connected with the packing interests. I know the most of you gentlemen so well that I know you would not take a position that you did not believe was right, and I doubt if you would stand for suggestions from the packers or their agents.

I notice among the names of the committee who signed the resolution some of my best friends. I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to them and asking their advice.

Very sincerely, yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

Mr. C. G. BURKITT,
Secretary, Middle Tennessee Farmers' Institute,
Antioch, Tenn.

Mr. President, the gentlemen whose names are signed to the foregoing resolution are among the leading men of my State. There are no better or more intelligent or more patriotic men anywhere. Their views are entitled to the greatest respect, and I have read them because I want the Senate to hear them. At the same time I can not see the matter as they seem to view it. It is claimed by many that this kind of resolution and the many letters that we constantly get are the result of propaganda set on foot by the packers. I can not say that the packers of the country are inciting a great number of resolutions and letters, but I feel that some public notice of the matter should be taken, and for this reason I have read the resolution and my reply to it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have received a great many telegrams and letters urging me not to support the Kendrick-Kenyon bill. Representatives of the packers have gone over my State misrepresenting the Kendrick-Kenyon bill. They have stated that these measures would discourage the raising of hogs and cattle, when they know they are necessary for their protection. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the author of the bill, is one of the largest cattle raiser in the country. In my State and other Southern States the packers arbitrarily fix a price of 3 cents per pound less for hogs than they pay in other States. Reducing the high cost of living is the most important question before Congress. If the packers would sell their products at a reasonable profit instead of spending millions on this propaganda to fool the people, there would be no necessity for this legislation.

I send to the desk a letter which I should like to have read to show who is responsible for the letters and telegrams that I am receiving.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

FITZGERALD, GA., August 1, 1919.

Senator W. J. HARRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of July 29 and note with interest what you say.

I was very much surprised at the contents of your letter and did not know what telegram you referred to until I ascertained from the Western Union Telegraph Co. here just what you had reference to. After making an investigation of this matter I find that on July 28, 1919, the following telegram was sent you, also to Congressman J. WALTER WISE and Senator HOKE SMITH:

Am not in favor of Federal control meat-packing industry, Kendrick (S. 2199) Kenyon (S. 2202) bills.

(Signed) J. R. WILLCOX.

I understand from the Western Union Telegraph Co. operator here that these telegrams were sent by a representative of Armour & Co., they or he taking the liberty of signing my name to these telegrams without consulting me or receiving any authority from me whatsoever to do so, and, to say the least of it, I do not approve of any such methods as they are using to influence the defeat of any bills that might come before you.

As to what action you take in reference to the above-mentioned bills I rely entirely in your ability and judgment, and assure you that whatever action you take will be entirely satisfactory with me.

In the meantime I am writing Armour & Co., asking them where they obtained their authority to sign my name to telegrams.

Thanking you very much for your letter and assuring you that you have my best wishes, I am,

Very truly, yours,

J. R. WILLCOX.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an extremely interesting and instructive letter from Mr. Andrew Fitzpatrick, of New Orleans, La., president of the Crescent City Stock Yards & Slaughter House Co. (Ltd.), of the city of Arabi, La., and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading. It is a very illuminating discussion of the matter of the high cost of living.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ARABI, LA., August 1, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your very kind favor of the 22d instant received and carefully noted. I certainly appreciate your statement that you want my views on this very important question, and as you are on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which these bills have been referred, I will take the liberty of expressing to you my views a little more in detail.

In the first place, I think that the license law for any industry and especially a complicated and complex business like that of the packing industry is unwise and should be defeated on principle. This is certainly a long step toward Government ownership. It is contrary to our past ideal and history. It is un-American and means centralization of the Government and paternalism. In fact, I think that its ultimate object is socialistic control of business generally. Both of these bills, as drawn, mean practical Government operation, and we have certainly had enough of Government operation with the railroads and line systems. Government operation means inefficiency and inefficiency means added cost to the consumer.

These bills are not only unwise in principle but they are very dangerous by way of precedent, for if the license law is wise for the packing industry then it is necessarily wise for all other business generally. It is in keeping with the communistic spirit that is now gripping Europe, and I do not believe that in this day of unrest and reconstruction that there should be such a radical step taken in the way of business control of this country. This legislation can not be considered merely with reference to its effect upon the packing industry alone. It must be considered, in the first place, on its merits and as a precedent, and I am firmly of the opinion that it would be a monumental mistake for this country to commence placing the business of this country in the hands of men and bureaus in Washington.

In the second place I want to call your attention to the effect which this legislation would have upon the South. It is the South that needs diversified industry and manufacturing development. You know that the big packers have been looking to the South for some time and have made some investments in our section. Morris & Co. has invested in New Orleans, and is now arranging to extend its plant. If this sort of legislation is passed, how could you expect these packers to branch out and develop the South? I think this is a question to which the southern Representatives and Senators have not paid sufficient attention. If the license law is fastened upon business, it will strike down personal initiative and ambition in business. I can not conceive that anyone would want to make extensive investments in new territory under a law which is controlled and directed by the arbitrary whims of one man in Washington. This can not be disregarded by the southern Congressmen and Senators.

But in the third place, I am perfectly willing to rest the fate of this legislation strictly upon the merits of the proposition as to the packing industry itself. As you know, the packers are merely manufacturers between the producer and the consumer. They occupy a very difficult and delicate position, because the producer, from whom they buy their raw material, wants high prices for his live stock, and the consumer, which is everybody and who buys the finished product, wants it very cheaply, and it is self-evident to any fair-minded man that you can not have cheap meat on the table of the consumer when the packer pays a high price for live stock.

But I assert, and invite successful contradiction, that if the packer performs his work (a) efficiently, (b) at a reasonable profit, and (c) without any unfair practices toward his competitors, that the people have absolutely no ground for complaint, and there should be no radical and untried legislation fastened upon the industry.

Now, let us look at these three points for one moment and see what the actual facts are. The efficiency of the packers is conceded. It is probably the most efficient large industry in the world and in that connection great care should be taken not to destroy that efficiency, for if the work of the packer along economic lines is seriously affected, then the consumer must pay more for his meat.

On the question of profits, the fact is that the books of the packers have been carefully checked by the Federal Trade Commission, the Food Commission, disinterested chartered accountants of the bondholders of the various packers, and are subject to tax by the Internal Revenue Department under the income tax. In addition to that, the returns of the packers under the income tax must be made by their officials, under oath, and it is unthinkable that these men would subject themselves to the penitentiary by making false returns. The Food Commission has reported to the President that the packers made scarcely 60 per cent of what they were permitted to make under the food act, which should establish to the satisfaction of any fair-minded man, that they are not a monopoly and are not profiteers. It is conceded, even by the bitterly partisan Federal Trade Commission that the profits of the packers represent but the small fraction of 1 cent per pound. Please think of that for one moment, because even if the entire toll of the packer, as the manufacturer, is eliminated it would not seriously affect the cost of meat to the consumer. Consequently they are not profiteers and are not the cause of the high cost of living. I say to you, unqualifiedly, that anyone who questions the amount of the profits of the packers either does not know the facts or else he is insincere.

Now, as to the question of competition. It may be in the early days of the development of this new country that the packers, like practically every other business in the country, engaged in some practices that were not entirely blameless, although my information is that they have never been convicted in any court of justice for violating any law. But the fact is that when the Federal Trade Commission, with a very large appropriation, examined the packing industry for the sole purpose of "getting" the big packers, they wrote to all of the small packers for instances of unfair competition, and then followed this up with personal interviews, but my information is that at the hearings before the congressional committees at the last session, they could not get a single small packer to testify to any unfair methods on the part of the big packers. On the contrary, many of them appeared and testified against this form of legislation, saying it would ruin their business, as well as that of the big packers, and that the big packers were fair competitors. The indisputable fact is that there are more small packers in the business to-day than ever before.

Consequently I feel free to ask what particular evil, or wrong, is it that they seek to correct by this legislation? What more could be asked of the big packers than that they conduct their business efficiently, at the minimum cost and without any unfair practices toward their competitors?

There has been a well-organized "propaganda" launched in this country and in Congress during the last few years against the big packers, and I say to you, in all seriousness, that if the effect of this is to bring about legislation that will strike down efficiency, that it will necessarily increase the cost to the consumer and the people in the end will pay. This vital industry is performing a great work for the people, and the question should be handled along the lines of statesmanship, and you men in Washington should see that in these days of excitement and unrest that unwise legislation should not be enacted that would rise up to vex us in the future.

A great deal has been said about the size and power of the packers. If you have studied this question at all you will know that volume alone has enabled the big packers to develop all of the by-products to the greatest possible extent, which is in the interest both of the producer and of the consumer. If this industry were split up into infinitesimal units we would go back to the days of the small butcher and the by-products would not be utilized. The fact is that the packers make their profits practically alone out of the by-products.

Some people would fasten radical legislation upon this industry, because they argue that they have the power to do harm. My answer to that is that they can not point out any evils, or wrongs, in the conduct of the industry at the present time, and as it is being conducted efficiently and at the minimum profit, no dangerous and untried legislation should be enacted at this time. If at any time in the future this power is used to the detriment of the people remedial legislation can quickly be had.

You know it is contended that the big packers have some advantage through their ownership and operation of the refrigerator cars. This is absolutely false. They were required to build these cars in the first instance because the railroads would not. They pay the same freight for the products shipped in these cars as those shipped in railroad-owned cars. They are operating these cars at a loss. They must have refrigerator cars, because they are dealing with a highly perishable product. It is to the interest both of the producer and the consumer that this product be moved quickly from the packing plants to the eastern markets for consumption. If the packing plants are not relieved then they would not buy the live meat animals on the market every day, as they are required to do. This matter has been gone into very exhaustively by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if you have any doubt of my statements on this subject, I would thank you to look into that hearing. You will find that the packers need all the cars that they now have, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, after this exhaustive research and inquiry, found that it was to the interest of the people generally that the packers should operate these cars. If they are thrown into Government operation, then the packers' cars will be diverted to other uses and the efficiency will be lowered. If they want the smaller packers to have refrigerator cars, then let the big packers retain what they now have and let the Government require the railroads to build additional cars for the smaller packers, and they will then all be on the same footing. I can assure you that the packers want no advantage in this regard.

But in considering this question you must also bear in mind that there are a great many other privately owned cars in this country, such as oil cars, etc. What is to become of them? Can there be one rule for the packer and another rule for other people?

It is also charged that the packers should not be permitted to have any interest in the stockyards. The fact is that the stockyards are absolutely dependent upon the packers, and the packers are in turn dependent upon the stockyards. The packers are interested in these yards, in building up these markets so that they will have plenty of raw material. It is silly to say that the stock ownership in a public market can affect the price obtained for an animal offered therein and on which anyone is privileged to bid. It is also perfectly plain to my mind that the people who own these stockyards should be people who are interested in the industry itself and not outside people, whose only interest will be in their dividends. If you will study the question of the stockyards that have been built by the packers near the source of production—that is, the small stockyards, denominated by the Federal Trade Commission as the "fifty-fifty" yards—you will readily reach the very fixed opinion that it would be a calamity to the producers to require the packers to sell their interest in these yards. It is the packers who stand back of these yards. The small packers only buy exactly what they want every day, but the burden is cast upon the big packers of cleaning up the yards every night and buying everything that is offered. If you have any doubt on the question of the advisability of the packers being interested in stockyards, I would like to go into that matter further with you and give you facts and figures which, I think, will be very convincing.

A great deal has been said about the power of these so-called five big packers. This is largely propaganda, but they must be large if they are required to buy and pay cold cash every day for the live animals offered in these markets, and if they are to get foreign markets for American meat. This is to the interest of the producer and of labor as well, for if this export business is cut down it will cut the price of the live animal in two in a few days, and when that is done production will fall off; and when that comes about then the price to the consumer will go up. You see that the packer simply must pay enough for the live animal to encourage production, and at the same time he must sell the finished product low enough to encourage consumption. But I want to say to you very candidly that the pernicious activity of the Federal Trade Commission here and abroad has had a direct effect upon our exports. England is now threatening to boycott American meats and to get their meat in the future from her colonies and South America. We must look at this matter with vision and with our eye to the future. I sometimes doubt whether these people really know what they are doing. It would be a dreadful calamity to strike down the efficiency of this vital industry.

Of course, you know the game well enough to know that where there is well-organized propaganda, as there is in this case, their first effort is to create in the pubilc mind that there is necessity for some legislation. I say to you that there is no necessity for any legislation against the packers, and I defy the successful contradiction of this statement. But to place this complex and complicated industry under the license system so that the business would be conducted according to such "rules and regulations" as one man in Washington might announce, would be absolutely fatal. Then the "rules and regulations" so determined upon would be carried out by political appointees, inexperienced in this business. This state of affairs is nothing short of its being unthinkable.

I am very much in earnest in this matter, and am so thoroughly convinced of my position that I do not want you to rely merely upon my statements or assertions. I am ready and willing to back up any of these statements in any way that you may determine, so that you will be satisfied in your own mind. This means much to the country generally; it means more to the South, for if this law is passed then the South may never hope for packer development. And not only that, this law would affect other business, and it would in the same way affect general manufacturing development in this section. We are hoping to build up a great live-stock market here in New Orleans, and a great deal will depend upon your position in Washington on this vital question.

I understand that the packers are not popular in certain quarters. How would that be possible in view of the very unfair propaganda that has been launched against them in the last few years, and particularly by a branch of the Government? But this is the time when men must stand firmly on great questions of this kind.

I want to thank you very cordially, indeed, for the opportunity of expressing to you my opinions more at length, and I stand ready and willing to give you any data or information that you will require on this subject.

Hoping that you will go into it very thoroughly, and that you can conscientiously see this subject on its merits, as I do, and with highest regards, I remain,

Yours, very sincerely,

ANDREW FITZPATRICK.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that, with the permission of the Senate, I shall address the Senate on Tuesday next, August 12, on the league of nations.

THE RAILROAD QUESTION.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I make a statement with regard to the railroad question.

I think everyone realizes that we are approaching, if we have not already met, an exceedingly serious situation. We ought in this crisis above all things to keep our heads and to consider the various phases of the problem in good temper. We ought not to denounce the railway men for demanding an increase in their wages unless we are very sure of our facts.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. NELSON. Is this demand for an increase of wages made the basis, directly or indirectly, for Government control and operation?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. The Senator will be compelled to answer that question for himself. The railway executives have been demanding an increase in rates for a long time, and no one, I think, has denounced them for believing that rates of transportation should be increased, whatever differences of opinion there may be upon the subject. Just so we ought not to denounce the railway workers for insisting upon increased pay until we have informed ourselves with respect to the justice of their demands. I say this because——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.
